The regiment is one thousand and forty-six strong, under the command of Col. McConnel, and the men are all well armed and substantially equipped. During their brief stay here every attention was paid to the strangers by our citizens. At five o'clock the regiment went through a regular drill, in presence of a large crowd of people, exhibiting a degree of skill and accuracy in all their movements, and a familiarity with the manual, that would do credit to old military campaigners. The gallant Michigan-diers were enthusiastically cheered as the train moved from the depot.
