We have been furnished with a minute description of the various rounds, thirteen in number, but doubt the policy of publishing it at this period of wars and rumors of wars, lest it should unduly excite the public mind, which is already at fever heat. The first round resulted in the first knock down for W. The third round ended in first blood for P. On the thirteenth round W. succumbed beneath a stunning blow on the left temple, inflicted by the valiant P., which ended the fight. The seconds here advanced and gave it as their opinion that the thing had gone far enough to satisfy both parties. The combatants expressed themselves satisfied, and invited the crowd to liquor, which solemn ceremony was afterwards performed at the European Hotel. The total lamage to both parties may be summed up in one black eye, a claret-stained nose, and a torn pair of unmentionables. The young lady who was the innocent cause of the quarrel, on learning of it coolly remarked that the aforesaid W. and P. "made fools of themselves," and that she "would cut the acquaintance of both."
