A SCOUT'S ADVENTURE

We had reached the entrance of a narro pass which led through some rugged hills. Ou party was not small, but its members, were de-termined men, none of whom were novices in scenes of danger. We marched in sillence, that was broken only by the muridized whispers of the men, the orles and fluttering of birds, or the quick plunge of some small animal through the thick foliage, which, from the very edge of the path we were pursuing, spread amid lofty trees thinly scattered on the hill.

Day was near its close. We were distant some miles from the camp. The enemy might be in possession of the defile in overwhelming numbers. It was determined that we should keep in compact order until we had got well become the energy when exit he Still we listened, but in vain. No further sound was heard. Why was there no other signal? Was it some solitary wanderer, who sent that shrill cry forth through the stillness (in mere wantonness) and with no other motive than that of breaking its monotony. Not so. There was a significance in that sound that breathed war and defiance as plainly as if it had come from the blast of a trumpet. "Up and moving, men!" came, in low tones, from the lips of the sergeant in command. "Let 'em try it again."

Our march was resumed as before; but we step more stealthily, listened with painful attention and glared on every side with the intensity of blood-hounds. The defile took an acute turn to the right, and on the left was a naked space, extending for some yards, devoid of all verdure, but the gray moss clinging round the gray rooks.

"They're dead. Let them rot?" said one who, appeared to be the leader of the party.

'Not all dead," I replied.

Had a voice actually issued from the tomb, as mine undoubtedly seemed to do, its effect would not have been much more startling.

I again pursued my way along the bridge alone. Many a bullet whistled past me from my inveterate but bewildered foes, and many a marrow escape I ran of being hurled into the dark river, or of impalement upon its half-concealed rocks. But one such death sufficed for that night. At length I reached the other side.
