No other vessel or boat will be ward, and marching through Winchester found all excitement and confusion, people running to and fro, ambulances loaded with wounded whose groans were truly distressing, waiting to be unloaded at the temporary hospitals which had been prepared, and everything betokening how terrible the contest had been. As we pro ceeded along the Strasburg pike, the road was nearly filled with ambulances and stragglers from the field of battle, nearly all bearing som tropy of the fight, and all, more or less, be grimmed with powder. Shortly after passing the battle field, in which our two hundred dead bodies still lay unburied, we threw off our knapsacks, so exciting did the pursuit become and by evening, when within two miles of Ce-dar creek, on the other side of which Jackson was encamped, weary and nearly worn out, having marched for nearly forty-eight hours, we bivouaced for the night, building large fires, and lay down upon the ground without any blankets, and many not having overcoats. The night was cold, but all arose in the morning ready to push forward, and with some slight skirmishing by our bateries in front, we reached

Strasburg about noon or a little atter. Jackson, however, proved too skillful at retreating to allow us to catch him, but we harrassed him so much that he was compelled to bury many of his dead, which he had taken with him, along the roadside, in order to lighten his wagons.---It was in fact the greatest rout of the war, and while our loss was large, yet his was double that of ours. The pomp and pageantry of sol-diering is very fascinatiog, quite romantic, but when we see the dreadful realities of war as we did on that day.' the heart sickens with hor ror over the bloody slaughter; yet the rebellion must be crushed. The whole of the Fifth army corps are now lying around Strasburg awaiting orders, Gen. Banks being here in person. I cannot tell you more.

Lieut. Whitman, of company "D," has been detached and is now acting Aide de-camp to Col. Donnelly of the 28th New York, who commands our brigade, Gen. Williams having been promoted to the command of the division, formerly under command of Gen. Banks. The promotion of Lieut. Whitman to such a responsible position will gratify his many friends at home. More anon.
