XXXVIIth Congress--First Session.

WASHINGTON, April 14. SENATE.

Mr. GRIMES, (lows,) at some length reviewed irginia.

The sloop was in ballast, and was coming slaves within the lines of the army, with the Columbus, Ohio, where they were forced to render menial service, under military law, to their rebel masters, thus establishing a system of slavery in free States. He cited similar in Iowa and Illinois, and thought that it was quite time that Congress should adopt some legislation in regard to this matter. There were as many different systems practiced as there were military departments. Some slaves were flogged and reurned, others shot, others called contrabands and admitted within the lines, and others proought to be at once countermanded and forever erased in obedience to popular feeling. The Northwest could no submit to any temporozing or compromising policy They had suffered too much already. They demanded that this rebellion should be crushed out. The forts of the South Atlantic are yet to be captured, and must be held for years to come. How should they be garrisoned when captured? He would answer that he was in favor of garrisoning them in whole or in part by soldiers of African descent, to be commanded by white officers. Our troops would wither under the enervating influence of the climate of the Gulf States.

The confiscation bill was taken up.

Prior to its consideration, Mr. HALE, (N. H.,) esigned his position as chairman of the Naval Committee; and in order that no misappreneusion might occur from this action, he st that he was influenced by no cause outside of he Senate.

Mr. HARRIS addressed the Senate at length on the confiscation measure, favoring the bill he had introduced. He said a confiscation law was imperiously demanded for the personal prosecution of traitors. He thought it would be most likely to prove ineffectual. It would be far more difficult to convict the arch traitor Jeff. Davis, if he was within the power of the federal Government, than some people imagine; where could he be tried, who would be witnesses, these four questions our worthy attorney general would find difficult to answer.

He favored the confiscation of slaves, as slavery had been the cause of the present war and has for years disturbed the elements of our national policies.

After an executive session the Senate adiourned.
