Monday Afternoon, September 22, 1862.

THE SURRENDER OF HARPER'S FERRY is the subject of much comment both among the press and the people of the country. It is alledged that Col. Miles confessed on his death-bed, that the act was one of treachery-that he had surrendered to the rebels after an understanding, and of course for a price. This Col. Miles was one of the officers who disgraced himself at the first battle of Bull Run. On that occasion he was drunk, and absolutely refused to move with the reserve which he was then commanding, to the relief of the main body of the army, struggling with such great odds against it, on that bloody occasion. It is maintained by the friends of Miles. that the evacuation of Marvland Height's compelled the surrender of Har per's Ferry. Be this as it may, the disgrace is still the same-the country has still been betrayed, and the energy, and patience, and devotion of our peoplo put to the rack once more in being compelled silently to observe such transactions, and not allowed to express their indignation, for fear it might appear that de-enment looked for its main stay and support.

Ever since this war commenced, the army has been cursed with this class of men. First, those who were known to sympathise with the South, but who were supposed to be honorable and chivalrous men-and upon whom the service depended for success. It was maintained before the public that we could not do without such men-that it was necessary to submit to some of their peculiarities, in order that the Legislature who will go pledged to oppose the some of their peculiarities, in order that the measures of the national and state administra-general cause might succeed.
