HARRISBURG, PA. Friday Afternoon, November 21, 1862, THE SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN-THE CREDIT

OF THE ADMINISTRATION. While a certain class of locofoco politicians are making use of every subterfuge and resort ing to all kinds of tricks, to ruin the credit and thus of course thwart the efforts of the present Administration to cope with the conspiracy of the slave-holders, it is marvelous as well as gratifying to behold the manner in which the credit of the Administration is sustained by the shrewd, far-seeing, and close-calculating men of the country. The Democratic leaders can manage to induce the mobs who rally beneath the ilad of slavery, to strike desperate blows at tue vitality of the government, but the same leaders have no influence where decency, intelligence, or patriotism prevail. They may carry city and state elections, while the mass of loyal men are absent fighting for the honor and the perpetuity of the government, but they cannot influence the business, or the productive energies of the country. These are still for the Government, despite the transient triumphs of Democracy, and these will ultimately not only crush out rebellion, but wrest the power which seems to have been temporarily lodged in the hands of the bitter enemies of freedom and free government.

As a proof of the credit of the National Ad ministration, and as evidence of the failures of the Democratic leaders to ruin and destroy that credit, the recent bids for the seven thirty bonds are convincing and overwhelming. These bids run to the immense sum of $30. 000,000, and from par to $4.12 premium. The Dial, an ably conducted financial journal, declares this self-abnegation of self is wonderful; especially as the opponents of the administration have, during the last political campaign, harped upon the expenditure of $3.-000,000 per day, and a debt from one all the way up to two thousand millions of dollars. Even now in the face of all these well coined falsehoods, we still find that a national loan can find one hundred and eighty-three bidders, and also with what pleasure can we read the names to this list-Banks, Bankers, Insurance offices, Institutions of Charity, private individuviduals, all coming up to carry on the war. THERE WOULD HAVE BEEN NO REBELLION. Such Who then shall say that this war is not popular? With very few exceptions, the whole Northern heart is in this putting down of rebellion; the means by which it is to be accomplished may make a difference of opinion, but of high business reputeaud influence, in writing that it should be suppressed, is the earnest wish on business to this office, expresses great regret of every heart. really and fervently loyal, are sincerely convinced that slavery was the cause and Democracy is now the encouragement of the slaveholders' rebellion. The proof of this is spread over the bistory of the Union, in the wrongs which slavery has inflicted on the government, and the excesses of which Democracy has been guilty in contributing to the extension and protection of slavery. If slavery had not existed, there never would have been a motive for destroying the Union-and if there had never been an organization to take refuge in the noble een an encouragement afforded to arm for the efence of slavery by the destruction of a government founded on free principles. The slave holders of the south were the first to discover that either slavery or freedom would have to give way to the progress and the settlement of the states and territories of the Union. The Democratic leaders were the first to make a clear issue on this subject, when they used their power to advance the interests of the institution of slavery. History proves this, if it proves any thing. The Democratic party when in power, never had a policy but what was impregnated with the interests of slavery. All its measures tended to the degradation, in a national and political light, of the interests of free labor, or the elevation, in the same light, of the interests of the institution of slavery. So persistent have been the Democratic leaders on this subject, that, regardless of their oaths, a Democratic President and his Cabinet actually armed and equipped the first traitor army, gave ships and material to the first traitor navy—and secretly if not openly encouraged the traitors to march to and seize the federal capital, as soon as the term of the said administration had expired. The ident fication of modern Democracy with the slave-holders' conspiracy is as clear as is their present identity with the open, bloody and revolting assaults of the rebels on the government. While history preserves the record of the outrages of this rebellion, it will also contain the proof of Democratic association with its origin and precipitation. We might as well attempt to separate the action and excuse the ingratitude of Brutus in contributing to the death of Cæsar, as essay to deny the influences of the Democratic leaders in the slave holders rebellion. All the blood, all the life, all the waste of treasure, all the desolation, all the present and future suffering, the agony, the remorse, the shame and the crimes of this rebellion must and will be justly ascribed to the leaders and the influences of the Democrati

THE movement of Gen. Burnside's army goes on successfully. Gen. Sigel, too, is managing his part of the new programme admirably. It is thought that the Orange and Alexandria railroad to Warrenton will be destroyed, or, at least, the bridges over it burned.
