of Napoleon the attention of the French Academy of Sciences was called to the fact that a storm of rain or snow invariably followed a battle, always in proportion to the magnitude of the conflict, especially if there was heavy cannonading. This was particularly the case in the Russian campaign, which was followed by such snow storms as never before were witnessed in the South of Europe. Some of the savents declared that rapid discharges of artillery, and incessant volleys of musketry produced concussion in the air, and drove the clouds out of their course, while others went so far as to adopt the theory since advocated by Prof. Espy, that the immense smoke of a battle was in itself sufficient to produce rain. There were skeptics, however, and when the war closed it remained a mooted point. Those who remember the rains which folorder that all may unite in the great subject of lowed the seven days' fight before Richmond, as well as those which followed all the other prominent battles on the Potomac, will at John M.
