SPEECH OF GENERAL SIMON CAMERON.

Gen. Cameron, on taking the chair, reminded the people present that the last time he had met with them, it was to take counsel against danger, to devise means for the common defence, and make such preparation as the crisis would permit, to meet and resist an invading foe.

Gen. Cameron then referred to the fact that the war was drawing to an end—it could not last much longer—he was satisfied that the rebels had struck their heaviest blows—and now all that was necessary to complete the work of triumph which our armies and navy were inaugurating, was a proper spirit of devotion by the people at home to the Government.

Government in arms—and thereby to restore the Government on this hemisphere.

Gen. Cameron further urged every true man to wield his influence in order to make our political victories worthy of responses of gratitude, the great triumphs which are almost daily being emblazoned on the banner beneath which our brave soldiers are fighting.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN CASSMA.

As Mr. Cassma rose to respond to the introduction of the Chairman, he was greeted by the most cheering applause. When silence was restored, he said that his position in appearing before the people under the auspices which assembled the loyal men of Harrisburg, was of rather a painful character.

The speaker was willing to send commissioners to Richmond, but he wanted to lead them by Grant and Sherman, in the shape of artillery and cavalry, accompanied by many strong arms and stout hearts to support them.

Mr. Cassma then went into an elaborate review of the opinions of the Fathers of the Republic, touching the principles which which the national Union, the purposes for sign of its eternal endurance, and the preservation of the separate States which were parties of the grand whole.

The speaker next alluded to the panic and meanness which were sought to be created by the rebels in the minds of the public, those who opposed the war because they were traitors; have attempted and are still trying to delude the public with exaggerations of what the war costs.

Gen. Cameron then urged the necessity of a union of action to secure a great victory at the ballot-box. He communicated the cheering fact, that the prospect of political victory was never better than at the present time.

was enthusiastically cheered by those present. He said blessed are the peace-makers—but he believed that all the peace men that have yet appeared to the American people since the wicked war begun, the most glorious and effective were Grant, Farragut, and Sherman.

Rev. J. Walker Jackson (who was in the audience) was discovered by those present, and immediately on the conclusion of Mr. Kunkel's speech, the most deafening cries were made for Mr. J. to take the stand.

Col. McFarland, a soldier who had lost a leg in the battle of Gettysburg, was next called out. Col. McF. was unable to stand in addressing the meeting, and therefore occupied a chair while delivering his remarks.

The meeting adjourned with three cheers for Lincoln and Johnson, the army and navy, the County Ticket, the soldiers, that were present, and for Col. McFarland, who lost a leg at Gettysburg.

Gen. Sherman reported the arrival of a train of 2000 men, 2000 horses, and 2000 mules, from the front, and that the rebels were in a state of confusion.
