The Patriot & Union.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1860. REMINISCENCES OF KENTUCKY.

From Pioneers and People of the Mississippi Valley. In the year 1776 there were about one hundred fighting men in Kentucky. Of these from thirty to fifty were usually in garrison at Booneborough or absent on expeditions.

One fine summer afternoon, while the garrison was not dreaming of danger, some of the men lounging idly around the gate, or under the shadow of the stockade, were looking upon three out of the towers of Col. Logan's fort, the oldest of the fort's towers, the oldest of the fort's towers, the oldest of the fort's towers.

RED HEADS IN THE ASCENDANT.—The fashionable world is reveling in all the delight of a new and brilliant idea. The rage on the part of the ladies for red and gold has culminated, and the effect promises to be so stupendous as to throw in succession and confusion into the shade—in fact, it threatens to break up any quantity of Union, present and prospective.

poor wounded fellow are still outside the gate. The wounded man, Harrison by name, runs a few steps and falls, in sight of both attackers and defenders. Here he lies, and unless rescued must quickly be scalped. The Indians refrain from firing upon him further, hoping to lure others of his friends to his help. The cries of the wounded man for aid, the frantic grief of his wife, seem to fall on deaf ears.

Still the Indians maintain the siege. There are only twelve men left; their powder and ball are running low; a fresh supply must be had, or all the horrors of Indian captivity must be theirs. Some of the men employed on the work were killed a few days after the foundations were laid.
