seek;
Her treeses have stolen their darkness and light
From the wings of the morning and brow of the night.
Her arms are two round slander pillows of snow,
Just touched by a last sunset's paint-verment glow;
All things that are lovely in eatth, heaven, air,
Are rided to render my Mary more usir.
The tone of her voice is more musical far
Then the notes of the soft-throated nightingale are;
And less graceful than Mary the mist-wreaths that rise,
On the breath of the morning to welcome the skies.
I have thought when I kissed her that angels might sip
And nistake it for nec'ar—the daw of her lip.
Nor more pure than the thoughts of my own Mary's mind.

A CHAPTER OF BLUNDERS .- From a pleasant paper in Once a Week, devoted to Sir Boyle Roche, the eccentric Irish orator, we make the following extract:

Thus far the public life of Sir Boyle Roche. There is now another view of him to be considere l-the pleasant little obites dicta which have been put down to his score, and which there is no reason to doubt he really gave utterance to. After all, it is natural to suppose that the constraint of public speaking must have fettered the bovine fancy and checked the more frequent introduction of these comversational bulls, in the reading of which he is supposed to have had great skill.

Many of these are harpily preserved. "Sir, I would give up half—nay, the whole of the constitution, to preserve the remainder." This, however, was parliamentary. Hearing that Admiral Howe was in quest of the French, he remarked somewhat pleasantly that the Admiral would "sweep the French fleet off the face of the earth."

By-and-by came dangerous times of disaffection, and honest men's lives were insecure. Sir Boyle writes from the country to a friend in the capital this discouraging view of his position: "You may judge," he says, "of our state, when I tell you that I write this with a sword in one hand and a pistol in the other." On one occasion, when the famous letters to the Public Advertiser were attracting universal attention, Sir Boyle was heard to complain bitterly of the attacks "of a certain anony-mous writer, called Junius." He it was who recounted that marvellous act in gymnastics, when, in a tumult of loyalty, he "stood pros-trate at the feet of his govereign." He it was who denounced in withering language the apostate politician who "turned his back on himself." He it was who introduced to public notice the ingenious yet partially confused metaphor of the rat. "Sir," said he, addressing the Speaker of the Irish House, "I smell a rat. I see him floating in the air—but mark me, I shall nip him in the bud."

It was Sir Boyle who spoke in feeling terms of the gentleman with whose family he was connected by marriage: "He gave me his eldest daughter, sir," he said to one of the professional wits of the Irish bar; "his eldest daughter, sir." To him the wit: "If he had an older one he would have given her to you." Mr. Curran used humorously to insist that these strange bits of confusion were all the result of careful preparation; perhaps scarcely crediting that there could be found a mind with such an inveterate constituted twist in it. In the Irish House these sayings were welcomed with uproarious hilarity. There was the famous speech which confounded generations. "I don't see, Mr. Speaker, why we should put ourselves out of the way to serve posterity. What has ever posterity done for He was a little disconcerted by the burst of laughter that followed, and proceeded • to explain his meaning. "By posterity, sir. I do not mean our ancestors, but those who are to come immediately after them." His invitation to the gentlemau on his trav-

cal. ",I hope, my lord, if ever you come within a mile of my house, you'll stay there all night."
He it was who stood for the proper dimensions of the wine bottle, and proposed to Parliament that it should be made compulsory that every , quart bottle should contain a quart." Very pleasant, and yet perfectly intelligible, was his meaning—though it unhappily took the fatal bovine shape—was his rebuke to the shoemaker when getting shoes for his gouty limbs. "I told you to make one longer than the other, and instead of that, you have made one smaller than the other; the very opposite."

Still he could hit hard, and for once avoided his natural blundering turn. Mr. Curran stated he was quite capable of being the guardian of his own bonor. Sir Boyle retorted. "I wish the honorable gentleman joy of his sine-
