SATURDAY MORNING, OCT. 17, 1863. USURPATION. Extracts from Debates in the National Convention of 1787 upon the Danger of Usurpation.

The men who framed the Constitution were men of large experience. They had lived under the rule of England, and knew from actual experience, from recent traditions of their fathers, and even from the long history of the mother country, of the danger to the liberties of the people from the oppressions of those in power.

Their great object was to establish a government based upon the will of the people, with such written provisions and guarantees as would forever secure the people against the arbitrary power of the men who should represent the government.

They knew that the tendency of unrestricted power is to strengthen itself, and that the only safety, in the contingencies of the future, would be found in prescribing and limiting the powers of those who should administer the government.

Their words are full of warning and instruction, and afford a terrible rebuke to those who in the time of public excitement and danger, would break over the limits which the fathers set to the exercise of power.

The following extracts are from discussions upon various sections of the Constitution, and their application can be understood, without stating the different subjects of debate.

MR. HAMILTON.—On the other plan of appointing him [the President] for seven years, he thought the executive ought to have but the term of four years.

MR. MADISON.—A standing military force, with an overgrown Executive, will not long be safe companions to liberty.

MR. MADISON.—The Executive will be regarded by the people with a jealous eye. Every power for augmenting unnecessarily his influence will be disliked.
