

Human Remains Discovered.

In excavating the walls of an old building erected in 1770, on the south side of Walnut street, below Third, yesterday morning, the workmen discovered a much decayed coffin, containing a portion of the skeleton of a human body; so far decomposed, however, that no one could tell whether it was a male or a female. The coffin was of mahogany. On the top was a copper breast-plate, that had been silvered over, but it was so much corroded that nothing as to the identity of the remains could be gained by examination of it. The coffin was in a perpendicular position, embedded in an arch in the middle wall of the cellar, and walled up in front with soft brick. The inner wall was roughly put up, but there was another wall on the outside, which entirely closed the whole from view. The exterior wall was built by a master hand. The space in the coffin, around the body, was filled with quick lime, and it had eaten away the skull, spine, and most of the ribs. A thigh bone was in a remarkable state of preservation. The lower extremities were almost entirely reduced to blackened dust, mixed with the lime. It was rather lamentable to see the morbid curiosity of the crowd, in digging and fingering, and smelling the remains of what was supposed to be the most perishable portions of poor humanity. A woman who, from appearances, followed the roving profession of gathering chips, carefully wrapped up some of the dusty remains and putting it in her pocket, made a "bee line," for home, to show the curiosity to her acquaintances, little dreaming that perhaps she was carrying away the decomposed remnant of the yellow fever of 1793.

A crowd of people soon collected around, and various speculations, doubts, misgivings, and suggestions became rife among the spectators. The coffin was much decayed and crumbled to pieces in removing it away. Several small bones were obtained by many people, and one sedate looking young man, in putting a part of a rib into his pocket, coolly remarked that he would consider the propriety of having it made into a knife handle. Some of the bystanders gravely argued that somebody must have been murdered, whilst others contended that such was improbable, and instanced the fact of the coffin being mahogany, the breast plate, &c. An aged gentleman, after duly examining the lime and dirt, supposed that the body must have been there for at least fifteen years; another contended that it must have been there for fifty years.

There is an incident connected with this affair as follows: The owner of the building had often viewed the wall in front with suspicion. He imagined that the British had buried gold there, during the struggle with the sons of Johnny Bull, and he gave orders to the workmen, that when they came to that place to send for him. On removing the wall, he found the air built castle, to vanish at once into thin air, leaving behind it the wreck of humanity.

There is a statement that at one time the vicinity of the site of this house, was infested with desperadoes of the worst kind, whose midnight marauding excursions startled the people of the young city of Philadelphia. This era must have been prior to the erection of the building in question. There was a story some twenty-five years ago, that a house in the vicinity of Third and Walnut streets was supposed to be haunted, from various "mysterious knockings" heard there at unseasonable hours; generally about two or three o'clock in the morning. After this a firm of cabinet makers occupied the building, and they retired from business, having made a fortune in the making of coffins. It may probably take nothing short of Divine power to solve what seems at present to be a mystery. What adds to the unaccountable strangeness of the affair is the fact, that the coffin was heaved downwards, so the workmen inform us, and this posture, to say the least, is rather an intemperate one, to bury a friend or acquaintance. Humanity and friendship would at least dictate a decent burial, under any circumstances. Even in a heavy storm at sea, "poor Jack" is still cared for by his companions, and a decent burial, under circumstances that might well appal the hearts of many, is generally given to his frail remains by his surviving companions. If the body was victimized by the yellow fever, it is really somewhat strange that none of the surviving relatives of any of the "old inhabitants" ever heard of it. The following statement seems to be the most rational and charitable. It is said that the family of the gentleman who lived in that house in the time of the yellow fever, did not escape the epidemic. A person who lived there died with the disease, and was buried in the place where found. The burial was altogether private and there were many instances of the kind in those days of terror. As it would not be prudent under all circumstances to detail all the little particulars, we close the scene, with a full assurance that the frail emblems of humanity, were swept from the face of existence by the yellow fever, as above stated.—Phil. The Indians of California.

Near each rancho is generally a village of Indians. They are covered with dust, living upon acorns, wild fruit, and fish. They have nothing of the noble bearing of the Indians east of the Rocky Mountains; they seem to be only a few degrees removed from brutes. Their dwellings resemble almost exactly large dog pits where wood is charred. A pit is dug in the ground, a circular frame work is built, and this is covered with dirt six or eight feet high, with a small hole at the base to creep in and out of, and another at the top to let out the smoke. You will always see numbers of men sitting on the tops of their hives, sunning themselves while the squaws are generally engaged in preparing their corn flour, or in weaving baskets and pans, in which they are very ingenious. They make their perfectly water-tight. Their acorns are dried, then pounded fine, and mixed with some kind of berries, making a kind of bread, which is by no means impalpable, but it requires a man with the courage of a rattlesnake to eat or taste it. In fact, a man must cross the plains before he can summon resolution to eat it, especially after seeing them prepare it. The men are very expert in spearing salmon, of which there is the finest here I ever saw, and very abundant. They are now frequently employed in the mines for a mere trifle, and such generally contrive to get a shirt, and a few get rich enough to buy a coat and pantaloons; but since the rains have set in, I have seen hundreds of them wading the streams for fish, or travelling on the plains naked, and paying no more regard to the wet chilly storm than dumb beasts. In the valley they are now inoffensive, as the number of whites overawe them; but in the mountains they sometimes give the miners trouble, and some collisions had taken place. Those in the mountains are treacherous and unsafe, and will be, until they become acquainted with the power and strength of their Anglo-Saxon neighbors.

How to Raise Indian Corn.

A farmer, residing in Westchester county, New York, offers the following as his experience in raising corn the past three years. As it comes from a practical man, and details only what he actually did, it possesses a due degree of interest, and will be so estimated by the readers of the "Register." "I have tried nearly all the ways recommended for raising Indian Corn, and have found the following to be the best. In the spring, I had all the manure I can spare, on some piece of sward ground, and put it in heaps. I later plowing till near the time of planting, when I spread the manure, and turn it under with much care. I then sowed it with a heavy roller lengthwise of the furrows and harrow it well the same way. I mark it out both ways, three feet and four inches, plant the corn about an inch deep, and use the cultivator three times, both ways. At the second time of going through it with the cultivator, I follow with the hoe and clean out all the grass and weeds in the hill, but I never haul dirt to the corn. I make no hill, as I think it does more hurt than good; and at the time of gathering my crop, the ground is as smooth and level nearly as an oat or rye field. "I have pursued the above method for three years, and have usually reaped about fifty bushels of shelled corn to the acre. The last season I raised at least 75 bushels of shelled corn to the acre, by the same method. I can now raise from 50 to 75 bushels to the acre, as easily as I formerly could 15 to 20, and it is all through the information I have received from my County papers."

Marriages with Creoles at the South.

When staying at New Orleans, Mrs. Houston, in her "Hesperus, or Travels in the West," relates that she heard of a marriage of a respectable white man with a creole, which she describes thus—"It is well known that marriages between a white man and the descendant of a negro, in however remote a degree, is not legal in the slave states. Ingenious methods have been found of evading this law; but as a successful employment of such devices not only subjects the individual so acting to great contempt, but also deprives him of his rights as a citizen, they are seldom resorted to. Before a marriage can be legally solemnized between a white and a colored person, the former is required to make oath that he has colored or negro blood in his veins. The difficulty to a white man taking this oath lies not only in its absolute falsehood, but in the melancholy fact, that by acknowledging the existence of such a stain in his constitution, he voluntarily shuts himself out of the pale of communion with his countrymen for ever. Great however, as is the natural repugnance to this step, it was once taken, and that not very long ago, by a young American, who was a resident in New Orleans. A rich merchant and sugar planter, of I believe, Jewish extraction, had an only child, a daughter, and moreover a quadruped, of great beauty and accomplishments. The young lady was the acknowledged heiress of her father's vast wealth, but he refused to bestow either his fortune or his pretty quadruped on any but a white man, and that in lawful marriage. In spite of the mighty bribe held out, there was found but one man who was daring enough to demand the hand of the lady in marriage, and to be willing to take the oath which was necessary to make that marriage valid in law. With a view in some sort, to satisfy his scruples of conscience, the suitor of the maiden, previous to his appearing before the authorities, pricked the finger of his fair fiancée, and inserted some of the blood which trickled from the wound into a gash which he had previously made in his own hand. After performing this delicate operation, he fearlessly, and with an open front, took a solemn oath that within his own veins negro blood was flowing, and was then allowed to claim his bride. But after such an avowal, America was no longer a country for him, so he lost no time in carrying off his rich and lovely bride to far-off (and in this case, more liberal) Europe, for there wealth always obtains consideration, and shades of color are not too closely investigated."

Silent Orators.

Within a circle of ten miles of Duncan's Island, the following iron establishments have suspended operations: Monticello furnace, Juniata furnace, Emeline furnace, Victoria furnace, Oak Grove furnace, and Perry furnace. There remains in operation in that vicinity, only the Caroline furnace and the Duncannon iron works. Each one of these furnaces, when in operation, should be regarded, by every intelligent mind, as yielding from its red-hot fires, not only a certain product of iron, but of something whose value is beyond comparison—a happy subsistence for many hundreds of workmen, and their families.

Tic DOULOUREUX OR NEURALGIA.—Johnna Lynchburg, of Clarence N. Y., states that for twelve years she was severely afflicted with Tic Douloureux or painful affliction of the nerves of the face, attended with great swelling and much pain, so that she was unable to attend to her work. "That the only sure remedy she had found, was in the use of that celebrated medicine known as Geo. W. Mercliant's Gargling Oil; by taking it and by applying it to the parts affected. She also states that she has been afflicted with bleeding at the lungs and weakness of the breast,—that of all the above diseases she had been cured by the internal use of external use of this oil; and has since been able to attend to her work. She has also used it with great success in burns. "See advertisement in this paper and call on the agent for a pamphlet which gives a full description of this remarkable remedy."

ADVERTISING.—There is no fact better understood than that excellence of any kind in any business will not be rewarded unless it is advertised, while, by a liberal system of advertising, the public are soon enabled to test a man's merits and reward them accordingly. A well-known instance of this is to be found at Shepherd's cheap and fashionable clothing store, in Chestnut street above Third, which is now universally known as the best establishment of the kind in Philadelphia.
