The Death of Louis Phillips.

An old man has gone to his grave who commenced a political life in the first year of the European revolution, who lived for the purpose of accomplishing compromises of that revolution, and who closes his career in exile—each and every compromise a dead failure. Such opportunities for studying politics were never presented before. Such a blunderer of a politician will surely never live again.

As he was old and an exile, moralists have been tender with his memory. A good muxim is to the effect that we should speak of the dead only in commendation; a better maxim would be to the effect that we should say nothing of the dead which Of Louis Phillippe it is speciis not truth. ally desirable we should be candid, because Louis Phillippe was a representative man. of a class and of a regime, both involved in the results of his career; and the truth to us appears this that a man less worthy of esteem than Louis Phillippe it would be difficult to find.

The facts will attest that he was utterly and entirely destitute of a principle. He was born on the cadetside of a court; he was Uhred in the saloons of a court which echoed with the political infidelity of Brissot; and he was educated in the elegant laissez-faireism of Mad. de Genlis. Yet, thus saved from the traditional doctrines of royalty, he never acquired the antagonist faith of rationalism. There was nothing positive in his nature; and, when the shock came, he would neither join king nor people, and made only one demonstration --- entering an army which was created to temporize. He was, in fact, a ship which ran through the sea without a rudder—a partisan without a cause—a fanatic without a faith. His history was one series of disasters, and each disaster is trace able to his impotency to deal honestly with a precise principle. An ancient philosopher could only account for human life by saying that the organs of the body sustained a series of accidental jerks-no one day's life being, from the same cause, as the previous day's. Louis Phillippe believed that political life was an affair of intrigue, and never comprehended the perpetual operation of one law. By "governing" the world. he could only conceive "mannging" the world; and so, from first to last, was his statesmanship a swindle, and of the worst sort, an unsuccessful swindle.

There can, in human nature, be no neutral-with safety: every man must take his side, and write, act, and fight on that side. If a man have an unsteady, sandy, intellect, he is sure to be a dishonest man. The positively bad are abhorred; but he who, not being positively good, shirks because of his mental defects, the selection of any principle, is likely, in the end, if significantly situated, to do most harm to the world Louis Phillippe was essentially such a man -of no strong, earnest, vigorous spirit; not evil enough to be a misanthropist-not generous enough to be a philanthropist; but, partly from teaching, partly from character, determined enough to use the world. He never seemed to have looked back at the past: he never seemed to think of the future—and the present was in his eyes, a materialist scramble, in which he was the cleverest fellow who got most sixpenses and fewest shin kicks. He started and died as a man "guided" by circumstances,"-and they most frequently, guided him into the shade. By birth and accidental antecedents, gave them more than his name. He had no principles to give ; and he was incapable of taking any. His prominence was not brought about by his own ambition. That sentiment, in its heroic sense, he could not feel-neither the ambition of a Marius, nor Elizabeth K. Moser, both of Allentown. the ambition of a Washington. He was fond of power-but for the sake of the sensation not for the sake of the good he could do; and he had neither the intellect nor energy to do direct evil. He was "guided by circumstances," and became prominent when he was asked to step forward; and as he never know a principle, so he never felt a responsibility. He was asleep in his saddle at Jemannes; then came the order-and then the gallant rush which won the battle. Between 1815 and 1825 he only hinted, never acted at liberalism; between 1825 and 1830 he watched the course of events; but in June never suspected what July would bring forth. When the three days arrived and when he was the only man in France to whom France had to look for safety, he gave one thought to the scaffold, another to the throne none to France, or he would never have naken the throne. He was a serenely selfish, cold-blooded, man-not to be agitated in a battle, nor to be influenced in a revolution-because his scope never included more than the one person-himself.

His reign from 1830 to 1848 was not a glorious one. To say that he preserved ace is to compliment him far too highly: he desired peace, for his own sake; but no one man, in whatever station, could have preserved peace, if Europe had not been exhausted. The selfishness which led him to preserve peace-ministers led him to avoid reform ministers. In that long reign he gave not a single gift to France-nor institutions, nor works, nor ideas. Instead of this he amassed a large fortune and made good matches for his children. He was well off-and never coul'd understand what they meant by reform. While Paris was heaving with the throes of a latent insurrection, he was sending envoys to Madrid to steal an Infanta for the boy Montpensier, and to force upon Isabella an epicene husband. Whilst great principles were being agitated in the press, he was sowing functionaries over the land, bribing voters, buying-up deputies-spreading a buge swindle MACKEREL in society, and, then, chuckling at his good shap, management. And when the bubble burst, CODFISH. and heroic France arose against the fraud, SALMON, this King of compromises came out in his HERRINGS, true colors-called for a cannon against the PORK, people; and, not being obeyed, turned his HAMS AND SIDES, back upon the scene which he should have SHOULDERS. faced-disappeared in a one-horse shay, and LARD AND CHEESE. collapsed into a Mr. Smith. "What is to become of me?" he cried: all other men cried, "What is to become of France?" In his eighteen years of rule he had done nothing to avert the danger, and in the danger France got no help from him.

So worthless, so selfish a man deserved the exile and the misery to which, finally he was sentenced. He took to a throne thu small chicaneries of a sixth-rate diplomatist; and the only mystery is how they were en dured so long. Without breadth of thought and nobility of heart, he never made but one appeal to France-the "comfort" and "convenience" of order at any price :-- and without a party, without friends, it will be one of the secrets of history why the hideous delusion was not sooner destroyed. His fate should be a lesson to all his cotemporaries. The moral of it is-that the compromise in politics does not answer, and the man who sets out without a principle is likely to leave off without a place. Louis Phil-lippe saw the revolution in which his father was swamped still progressing, and, in turn, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, on the premi swamped him. Yet, selfish to the last, and, pecause of his selfishness, stupid, he was planning to the last another compromise-mother equivoque—a "positively last" swindle. He leaves to posterity his memoirs, and they will let his posterity know that the world is not to be turned back—that management is not government, and that intrigue is not statesmanship:--that no crown will have homage which is but set with paste

The Funeral of Louis Phillippe .-- No day is yet fixed for the funeral, nor does the place of interment seem to be known, though the Roman Catholic Cathedral, St. George's road, Southwark, is mentioned. At Claremont a portion of the picture gallery has been partitioned off and fitted up as a chapel where divine service was performed daily, and at which their Majesties and the royal family attended. The chapel is now hung entirely with black cloth from the ceiling to the ground: in the centre a dais of two steps has been placed, covered also with black cloth edged with silver; and on this the coffin containing the royal remains has been placed; it is covered with a black velvet pall edged with deep silver lace in the centre. The coffin is surrounded by twenty-two massive silver candlesticks, and on the altar there are twelve others, with the usual requisites for the performance of the Roman Catholic form of Divine worship.

Very Remarkable .- An intelligent farmer in the town of Lewiston, related some time since a remarkable account of the cure of a fine horse which, in the act of ploughing, caught his foot in a root, and tore it partly off. He immediately cleaned out the dirt, and applied G. W. Merchant's celebrated Gargling Oil, replaced the hoof, bandaged it up tight, soaked it occasionally with the Oil, and in two weeks he was able to use the horse.
