The Husband's Reform.

A stranger of great distinction, and who had played no inconsiderable part in the political drama of the day, has lately returned to Paris, where some years since he dwelt for a long time. On his first visit to the capital, young and already famous, he married into the aristocracy of the Faubourg St. Germain. The return of this personage has excited the curiosity of the Parisian world, justified, it would seem, by former eccentricities, and by a strangeness of character which may be traced in the anecdote now going the rounds of the talkmongers. The individual in question was not born and educated in the class where he now finds himself placed by the right of personal merit. Instead of being tempered by early education, his disposition, naturally violent, unrestrained and uncultivated, was rendered almost unmanageable by the habits of a life spent amid camps. His fortune, too, like his greatness, came to him late; and it has been frequently remarked that those who obtain riches by their own efforts, and in middle life, possess a lively and powerful attachment for the wealth which long privation and laborious conquest have taught them immediately to value.
At the time of this illustrious stranger's entrance into the world of Paris, those shrewd observers, the curious and jealous of others' prosperity, remarked that his shining qualities were darkened by two very great faults—avarice and brutality. The latter of these faults was a sad feature in his married life and was the cause of poignant suffering to a wife well-born, brought up in the most polished society, surrounded by affectionate relatives, and accustomed to the refinements of aristocratic good-breeding. It was not long before she was made to feel the change, for the character of her husband began to display itself in the early days of her married life, and a shade of bitter to mingle with the sweetness of the honey-moon. This was sad, and all the promised happiness faded away. The union which had commenced under the most favorable auspicious saw its glories destroyed by stormy hours which became more and more frequent. It required all the rare virtue of the young wife not to succumb to the trials which humiliation, terror, injury and grief compelled her to undergo.
One day, after a scene of conjugal violence which had occurred in the presence of many witnesses, the irascible husband entered his own apartment, whither he was followed by an old and tried friend, who by his devotion and uprightiness had earned the right to speak plainly, a right he did not hesitate to exercise. Without heeding the still unexpressed rage, he very freely commented on the conduct of his friend, so little becoming in a gentleman. The culprit listened with a gloomy air and when the lecture was terminated, said—
"Your reproach is just; I deserve it; and I rephrase myself more bitterly than you have done; but what would you have? It is stronger than I am, it is out of my power to control it; I give way to my passion, fly into a rage and forget myself. When it is over I am ashamed, despairing, and yet all this does not prevent me from recommending and sometimes even the very next day, to my friends."

Opinion of G. Pageot.

M. Pageot, formerly the French Minister in the United States in a letter of some length, tells the French People, that they can have peace, stability, order and prosperity only in "the principle of heirship" i. e. the restoration of the Bourbons.
"This principle [he says] is as indispensable to the perpetuity of societies as that of families essential to republic. The most prosperous of all in modern times, acknowledges that in the preamble of its institution. 'The people of the United States,' it says, 'wishing to preserve for itself and for its posterity the benefits of liberty, decree and establish the present Constitution;' and further, in its fourth article, it says:—'The United States guarantees to each State of the Union a republican form of government.'" There is a decree, he reasons, in perpetuity, and a decree, which imposes upon our generation "the heirship" of the constitution of a preceding generation. M. Pageot pays the United States the following handsome compliment:
"I have lived, for many years in the middle of American democracy. I have been inspired with the most profound respect for its constitution—a work, not of metaphysical dreamers, but of distinguished statesmen—of virtuous men, of devoted citizens, who sought in the traditions of their country, and the realities of the situation in which they found themselves, the solutions their citizens asked from their knowledge and experience."
They did not confound the part of the legislators with that of innovators. They had no substitute for the metropolitan authority that of a central power which could bind the various States of which the Union was to be composed, and they strictly fulfilled their task. They respected all that was not necessary for its accomplishment. The political municipal, and civil institutions of every particular State, were left intact, and it is easy to perceive that the constitution given by Charles the First to the State of Rhode Island and its colonists continued up till these last few years. The edifice of the American republic is the work of several generations. It is necessary to dig deep into the soil in order to find the first foundation. There is the secret of its strength and of its duration. There is also a new evidence of this truth, so much overlooked in our days, that the institutions of a people, in order to be strong, independent and respected, must have their roots in the past. The American people (let those who admire them) for what they are not, be not displeasured by a traditional people—that is to say, they recognize their ancestor, and religiously respect their works. I have been, also, able to attest their singular aptitude for the republican institutions, but I have, in the same time, remarked what rendered them so fit for the practice of these institutions, showed their inapplicability to the people placed as ours, in conditions diametrically opposed."
There is much to think of in these remarks, and let them be weighed by our own people.
Jews in China
The North China Herald, of January 13, gives an account of a colony of Jews, recently discovered in the interior of China. Their pronunciation differs in nothing from that of the Chinese; they sound therefore neither the h, the r, the e, the o. In Hebrew, their pronunciation resembles very little that of the German and Polish Jews. They have the same calendar that is common to other Israelites, as the custom of saying the prayer after the renewal of the moon. They calculate the feast of the law on the 6th day of the least of Tabernacles, and hence may be referred a like similarity in all usages founded on tradition. They believe in purgatory, hell, paradise, universal judgment and the resurrection of the dead. They admit of angels, cherubim and seraphim. They have no particular symbol for the articles of faith. Their children are circumcised at eight days old. The Sabbath is observed with the greatest strictness. They light no fire that day, preparing their food on the preceding day. They like to marry only among themselves. They take no pains to propagate their religion, and never make proselytes.
