As to those who profess to ameliorate the Republic, they open a door to its even-tual overthrow. He rejected, therefore, completely all idea of revision, precisely because it was demanded by the three classes of opinion he had pointed out.

M. de Tocquaville was supprised that the advocates of a measure so fraught with hazard as the revision, should be found among those people who were most desirous of quiet. He expressed surprise that revision was not called for by the Mountain. Nevertheless, he was disposed to vote for revision, because he saw that public opinion was decidedly in favor of it. He did not judge from the deceitful criterion of penot judge from the deceitful criterion of petitions; but there was a general feeling near Stilesville, in the county of Hendricks, the vices of the Constitution. The only way of controlling that feeling was to go with it. He would vote for revision on condition of his being assured that the object was to consult the entire nation, and so arrive at a legal and pacific revision of the Constitution by the means therein indicated. But he would favor no project of revision, which was merely a mask for upseting the Republic by a coup d'ctat.

At the expiration of about two weeks, the plaster was removed and the operation found triumphantly successful, and now (June 18) there can be observed no more deformity than would be caused by a slight scratch. After the operation Dr. C. consulted an emnent surgeon, who remarked that all had been done that was necessary, but that he had no confidence that the parts would ever unite. The above is made public that all may know the effect of promptness in similar cases. Dr. C. has the gratification of knowing that a human face has been saved from disfigurement for life.
