Poetical Department.

The sweet and simple beauty of this poem, by James Russell Lowell, has been rarely excelled. It is as true in fact as it is poetical in expression : The snow had begun in the gloaming,

With a silence deep and white. Every pine and fir and hemlock. Wore ermine too dear for an Earl:

From sheds, new roofed with Carrara, Came Chanticleer's muffled crow; The stiff rails were softened to swan's down

I thought of a mound in sweet Auburn, Where a little headstone stood: How the flakes were folding it gently, Saying "Father, who makes it snow?" And I told of the good Allfather, Who cares for us below.

I remembered the gradual patience That fell from that cloud like snow:

And again to the child I whispered, "The snow that visiteth all; Darling, the merciful Father Alone can make it fall!"

Then, with eyes that saw not, I kissed her, And she kissing back, could not know

During the recent war between the Unied States and the Indians of Texas, a great number of volunteers joined the expedition. One of these, Captain Ferguson, of Kentucky, became celebrated for his hardihood and success in the terrible hunting of the Indians. The following incident will convey some idea of the character of the man, and also of the war still waging in the New

Accordingly, the following morning Captain Ferguson, mounted on an excellent horse, left his companious and directed his course across a vast prairie, towards a cluster of hills, hemmed in by thick woods which therefore summoned his remaining enerbounded the horizon. Arrived at the foot gies, and crept on, leading his horse by the of one of the hills, the Captain perceived a wards him. the American troops. He did not again look behind, but with goal, he spurred on his horse to its utmost speed. The animal stumbled and the cry of the Indians became more distinct; but day, the 24th day of February next, at 1 the noble animal rose again, and with a loud neigh, as though conscious of the peril that menaced his master he made, prodigous forward bound, and cleared the space which cover where he was; but he was not a man to vex himself for trifles, so he quietly resolved to pass the night in the open air, and defer till the morrow the task of finding his way. A clear stream bordered with shrubs ran near, and Ferguson, having unbridled his horse, wrapped himself in his cloak and lay down on the grass.

At daybreak he resumed his journey, following the course of the stream. When he had gone about four miles, he found the corpse of one of his companions. The poor fellow had been scalped, and Ferguson's first thought was that his friends had probably been surprised, and massacred singly. Indeed, the numerous hoof-prints of horses, some shod and some unshod, indicated plainly the recent passage of both white men and Indians. Slowly and cautiously he followed these traces without making any discoveries; until towards the middle of the day having climed up a slight eminence, he saw on the plain, at about a mile's distance, a large Indian encampment. At the same moment the Indians perceived the Captain, and leaped on their horses.-Cursing his own imprudence, Fergusion turned bridle and began as quickly as possible to retrace his steps. Arrived at the outer border of the wood, he saw on the plain which he was about to cross a dense clould of lurid smoke extending on either side as far as the eye could reach. It was a prairie on fire.—What was he to do? To return was death: to go forward, destruction no less inevitable. In this terible emergency, Ferguson did not lose his presence of mind, but continued to advance rapidly in the direction of the fire. When he met the black advanced guard of smoke, behind which the flame wound and darted like some monstrous hydraheaded serpent, Ferguson checked his horse and dismounted. He tore his mantle into pieces, fastened one as a bandage round his horse's eyes, and another so as to envelop the animal's mouth and nostrils; then he covered his own face in a similar manner. This was the work of a few moments-precious moments, for the yells of the advancing Indians became fearfully distinct. His preparations made, Ferguson remounted, and facing his horse towards, the fire spurred him on with the energy of despair. The noble beast bounded onwards, the fierce flames enveloping him and his rider; but the arm of the latter was of iron strength; he held up his horse, and impelled him through the fire. A few desperate bounds

All the poor creatures hair was singed off, and and large pieces of his hide came away at the slightest touch.

Tormented by a raging thirst, Ferguson dragged himself towards the farthest extremity of the plain; and there, he perceived a band of wolves advancing with savage howls, This new peril roused both the horse and became distinctly audible. The Captain his rider. A clear fresh stream was flowing each horse an Indian suspended horizontal also dipped his head into the delicious bathers by an arm and a leg. This is a common its restorative effect was magical. He recstrategem among the Indians, but luckily collected that the wolves in these vast deserts are accustomed to flock towards a prairie on fire, in order to prey on the animals escaping from the flames. The Captain examined his horse, and found with pleasure fight that they were discovered, the Indians that the poor creature was much recovered climbed nimbly on their horses and pursued and even neighed in reply to the wolves howling. More moved by this plaintive neigh than he had ever been by a human cry, Ferguson gently caressed the head of enemies spread themselves across the prai- his steed, and then mounting, urged him torie with the evident intention of cutting off wards the forest. The wolves meanwhile were crossing the stream in hot pursuit; their hoarse, yells sounding a thousand times more terrible than the whistling of bullets

A cold shuddering seized Ferguson. 'If my horse should fall?' he thought. But his eyes eagerly fixed on the yet distance thanks to his vigilence, and the feverish energy of the animal, they gradually gained on their persuers ; for the speed of a prairie
