This expedition, which has occupied public attention for the last year, left New-York few days since for its scene of operations. It consists of five vessels, including a steamer of 800 tuns, all which are under the command of Capt. Cadwalader Ringgold, a apoplexy, Andrew Engelman, aged 80 naval officer of great energy and persever-ance, and one who distinguished himself On while Commander of the Porpoise in the Exploring Expedition of Captain Wilkes.

No exploring or surveying expedition has ever left our shores, destined to so interesting and so wide a field of labor; to a field so little known, and one to the results of which commerce alike with science, will look forward with anxiety and a deep felt interest. Many imagine this to be the long talked-of Japan expedition, with which it has no connection. The latter has a distinct object in view, that of making a commercial trenty with Japan, as well as to compel the Japanese"to afford protection to the shipwrecked American seamen, thrown upon her shores. Ringgold's exepedition is for the purpose of exploring and surveying the shores of the Northern Pacific, and the Islands embraced therein. This will include the north eastern shores of Asia, north of Japan, including the Kurile Islands, the Gulf of Tartary, the Sea of Anadir, and the coast thence to Behring's straits. On the opposite Amerfcan shore it will trace the coast from the British possessions to the same straits. The Alentian chain of islands, which extend nearly from one continent to the other, will also be examined. Finally, an exploration of the Artic Sea within Behring's Straits will be made; not so much with a view of discovery, as to survey these unknown waters, which have recently become a place of resort for our whalemen. At the present time we know of no American or other commerce in these northern seas except by our whale ships, and an occasional Russian vessel to the town of Sitka, the principal port of Russian America.

In former times, extensive explorations were made in these seas, but they were rather for discovery than for the extension of commerce. As early as 1741 the Russian navigator Behring made an exploration of the Northern Pacific, when he discovered the Straits which bear his name. In 1799, Captain Cooke make a visit to these seas. after the great discoveries which have made his name so famous; and in 1804, another Russian navigator, Krusenstern, cruised in them touching at various points along the coast. Many other voyages were made of minor interest, none of which seem to have had any other object in view than the discovery of new lands. Commerce does not even appear to have been a secondary object .-Here is, indeed, a broad and untrodden field | public house, under the name of the and, as Captain Ringgold takes with him a corps of naturalists and other scientific men, with all the necessary preparations for a most through exploration, and a full outfit of the best instruments, the learned world will look forward with much interest for a prosperous voyage and safe return to our shores of this important expedition.

If our Government had no other object in view than to seek new fields for our numerous fleet now engaged in whaling, which is by far the largest in the world, at would be fully justified in the equipment of so large and well organized an expedition. But its objects are broader, having in view the extension of our commerce in the seas referred good attentive ostlers will always be at hand. to, and of making known to our seamen the coasts they will ere long be navigating.

This expedition, like that of Commodore Perry's to Japan, was conceived and fitted out by the late administration, and we have feared that in the great desire to annu! everything that originated with its predecessors, ent party in power might attempt to break it up. It has not quite enough of the filibusterring character about it to take with Young America; but the American people are now so deeply interested in the two great maritime expeditions referred to that to recal them would be one of the most unpopular steps the Government could take.
