

The Wreck of the Powhattan.

The New York papers render it probable that nearly all the bodies washed ashore were from the Powhattan, and that she was the only ship wrecked on which there was any great destruction of life. The Herald says:

The ship, laden with passengers, left Havre for New York on the 1st of March last, under the command of Captain Meyers, of Baltimore. She was driven among the shoals at the place we have indicated above, and remained there until Sunday evening at five o'clock, before she went to pieces.

During the long night of Saturday and the whole of Sunday, the unfortunate—it is supposed some two hundred and fifty in number—were seen clinging to the leeward bulwarks of the ship, with the sea continually washing over them, and expecting death at the ribe of every succeeding wave. No assistance could be offered to them, for the sea then ran so high that the boat, (if any had been at hand,) would have been instantly swamped.

Between four and five o'clock on Sunday afternoon, the ship's bulwarks burst, and about fifty persons, at the same moment were washed overboard. Mr. Jennings, the wreck-master; with others made great efforts to save some of those who were in the water, but in vain. The captain, too, was heard to cry from the ship, "For God's sake save some of those who are drowning." Every exertion was made, but it was no use; and in all of the six bodies which the wreck-master succeeded in rescuing from the water life was extinct.

About seven o'clock, the ship's masts went by the board, and almost immediately afterwards the hull burst in two, and every soul on board was launched into eternity. The sea presented a black mass of human heads and floating pieces of the wreck, but in a few moments all had sunk to rise alive no more. The beach was strewn with the dead bodies of woman and children, pieces of the wreck, the baggage of the passengers and empty casks. Nothing remained to mark the spot where the ill-fated ship had went ashore, except surging waves beating upon a fragment of the hull which lay upon the beach.

The crying of the drowning men and the shrieking of the women and children was hushed—all lay in the deep numbered with the dead, while the wind wailed loud and mournfully, adding still more horror to the awful catastrophe. All had sunk—captain, officers, crew, and passengers, of two hundred and fifty persons—not a soul was left to tell the tale. Capt. Jennings, who is stationed as a wreck master on the beach, had sent all the men that were at his command, though the snow storm was raging violently, to the Government House, in order to bring down the life car and other wrecking apparatus, and stood on shore himself watching the effects of the billows upon the ill-fated vessel. No aid came from the Government House, that night, and Capt. Jennings was compelled to remain there himself, a lonely watcher of the dead.

On Monday morning four men arrived from the station house, but there help came to late. The storm, seems, was so severe, that while on their way back to the wreck on Sunday, with the life car and mortar, two of them fell down exhausted, and the whole party were obliged to return nearly frozen to death. This party of men, under command of Capt. Jennings, set immediately about finding and gathering together those bodies that had been washed ashore. In the short space of an hour nearly twenty women and children were found almost naked scattered along the beach, some of them dreadfully bruised and cut.

One man was found about fifty yards from the beach, upon the sand-hills, with a child in his arms and from his condition it is supposed that he alone of all on board reached land alive and crawling out of reach of the waves, in order to save his own life and that of the infant in his arms, fell down exhausted on the sand, and was frozen to death during the night. The child was firmly looking in his arms, quite dead, and appeared as if it had also died ashore from exposure.

WRECK OF THE SCHOONER MANHATTAN.

The schooner Manhattan, of Bangor, Maine, Captain Fields, went ashore about one mile below the Powhattan, on Sunday night, within fifty yards of the beach. Capt. Jennings repaired to the spot and endeavored to persuade the captain and crew, seven in number to let themselves down by a rope from the end of the jibboom, which when the surf ran out, was hanging over the land, and they could easily have got ashore. Instead of following the advice of Capt. Jennings, the captain and all the crew shut themselves up in the after cabin, thinking, most probably, that the vessel would outlive the gale, and would be high and dry the next morning. The waves, however, soon made quick work of the Manhattan, and in an hour or so she went all to pieces.

Five of the men endeavored to get ashore on a spar, but only one of them—a man named George Griffiths, of Bangor, Maine—succeeded in getting ashore. He was found the next day in an insensible condition. When he returned to his proper senses he stated that the schooner was bound from Philadelphia with stone coal, and belonged to the captain and mate, both of whom are lost. He states that there was one passenger on board the Manhattan, who has no doubt met a watery grave.

THE PACKET SHIP UNDERWRITER.

The Ship Underwriter lays up her accounts.—As the weather continues moderate, she will doubtless be got afloat as soon as sufficiently lightened. The vessels sent down to her were alongside receiving the cargo.

War Declared--The Prospects.

Although the event has long been foreseen, and takes no one, therefore, by surprise, the formal Declaration of War by the Western Powers against Russia is, nevertheless, the most important news brought by the Hermann. The form of the national manifestoes in the two countries, and the manner in which they were received by the legislative bodies of each respectively, are characteristic. England, which enters on the war with strong reluctance and with misgivings she takes no pains to conceal, proclaims her purpose in a long, argumentative, apologetic document—subdued in its tone, and specially framed so as not to embarrass the return of friendly relations with the Czar when the war shall close. The declaration of Napoleon, short and decisive betrays the warlike purpose which, from the outset, has lurked under all his professions of peace. The Queen's address is heard in solemn silence by the Lords and Commons of the British realm, while the French Emperor's proclamation is received with cheers by the Chamber of Deputies, which breaks up with the cry of Vive l'Empereur. In England public sentiment has made the war; in France the will of the Emperor has to lose by a general European convulsion; while it is by no means certain that anything but such a movement would enable Napoleon to retain what he already has.

In spite of the alliance between France and England, the war on which they have jointly entered will be of a two-fold nature. Any war to which France is a party must sooner or later become revolutionary in its character; an English war on the contrary, will always tend towards the preservation of the existing state of Europe. Russia is the enemy of both—not only in the present crisis and from existing exigencies, but naturally and of necessity. Her ambition, in its schemes of territorial aggrandizement, finds England an obstacle in its path—and she hates France because she fears her revolutionary character and tendencies. Russia will probably be defeated in the end,—provided nothing occurs to interrupt the alliance between England and France; but she has the means of making it a protracted and expensive contest for her foes. That the want of gold is not an insurmountable obstacle to the Czar, is sufficiently shown by the example of Austria, which has existed for years on a financial fiction. The Russian Government will readily supply the lack of gold by copious issues of paper, which necessity will make current among its subjects.

Nor is the Czar likely to be so entirely isolated in his position as the Western Powers have fondly hoped. We have steadily maintained that Austria must eventually espouse the Russian side in this contest; and a week ago we predicted that the next steamer would show a change of tone concerning Austria on the part of the English press.—The extracts we publish to-day confirm our expectations. The truth is, the Russians know that it is only upon Russia that they can rely for aid in any future revolutions;—and that consideration alone would decide them to go with the Czar in his present emergency.

The crossing of the Danube by the Russians between Brailov and Galatz is probably a movement taken in concert with the Austrians, who would undoubtedly occupy for security Serbia and the other provinces, which would fall to their share in the final partition of Turkey, upon the outbreak of insurrections which would follow Osman Pacha's advance towards the Lower Danube. It may be however, that the Russian advance is something more than this,—that it is a bold attempt to engage the main Turkish army in a decisive battle, before it can be reinforced by the arrival of the French and English troops. The movement may prove disastrous, as the Russian General would have the allies on his left and the Turks on his right; but he probably anticipates that the presence of an Austrian army of 50,000 men on the Turkish frontiers would be sufficient to prevent Osman Pacha from leaving his rear thus unprotected.—Austria will ere long be compelled to abandon her neutrality; and her first step will undoubtedly be the occupation of Bosnia, Serbia and Herzegovina. Prussia can remain neutral much longer; but she will be quite likely to declare for the West as soon as Austria shall have declared for the North.—Then will come the moment for the outbreak insurrections;—and if the Western Powers do not grant "letters of marque" to the privaters of Revolution, the Czar will most certainly enlist them on his behalf.

Meantime the Russians are blockading the mouth of the Danube by sinking innumerable stones in the river, which will probably render its navigation impracticable for a long time. This indicates how little the Czar cares for the interests of commerce.—This single act does an immense injury, not only to the belligerent Powers, but to all the commerce of the world. It is an incident in one of the earliest encounters between the Russian and the Turks, in the time of SELIM II. That Sultan undertook to establish a communication between Central Asia and Western Europe, by opening a canal from the Don to the Volga;—but the laborers whom he sent thither, says the historian, "were surprised and killed by a body of men of uncouth fingers, strange features and barbarous language," who proved to be the subjects of his Muscovite Majesty. IVLN the Terrible. NICHOLAS is evidently determined to borrow his precedents from the most savage of his predecessors.
