St. Petersburg.

Prior to the various successes in arms of PETER the Great against the Finns and Swedes, which placed the provinces of Carelia and Ingria under the dominion of the Czar, Russia had no communication with western Europe by sea. The river Neva, whose channel empties the waters of Lake Ladoga into the Bay of Cronstadt at the eastern extremity of the Gulf of Finland, is the dividing line between the two provinces. A few miles above its mouth the Nena divides itself into two principal branches besides numerous smaller channels, which seperate a great number of islands formed by the gradual and steady deposite through a long course of years of sand brought down by the river. PETER, with a view to secure a permanent foothold in his newly acquired territory, and to follow up the advantage already gained of a water communication with the West through the Gulf of Finland at once commenced the crection of a fortress upon one of these Islands. On Holy Trini-1v day in the year 1703, the Emperor placed the first stone with his own hands, and thus the foundation of St. Petersburg was laid. The enterprise was prosecuted with all , The enterprise was prosecuted with an the energy for which PETER's nature was so remarkable, and no means at the command of in absolute sovereign were spared. The situation of the place and the marshy and unstable character of the ground rendered the work one of great difficulty. Large numbers of workmen were brought from all parts of the vast empire, and compelled to hoor under great disadvantages. So unprovided were they with proper facilities for labor, that in the construction of the fortress they were obliged to carry materials in the folds of their garments, or in mats. Notwithstanding these difficulties and the prevalence of wasting diseases among the workmen, so ceaseless was the activity of the Czar in pushing forward the work, that the fortress (which stands to this day) was completed in the short space of five months .--PETER established his residence on the spot that his presence might serve to prevent any delay or cessation in the operations of the workmen. He built himself a small house of wood in the neighborhood of the fortress, and directly opposite stood the dwelling of his favorite. MENCHIKOVF. At the close of the year 1703, these two houses with the huts and cabins of the workmen, and the fortress with its out-buildings constituted the whole of St. Petersburg. To force the growth and prosperity of his new capital PETER had recourse to many and arburary ukases or royal decrees .---The old families of the empire still clung to their uncestral palaces in the ancient capiaul Moscow, and were not to be moved by devotion to the prince to lend their personal offorts and presence to the increase of the upstart city. A royal decree compelled three hundred and filty noble families to remove to St. Petersburg and there establish residences; each family being obliged to build tion of a Governor-am willing and anx-in such place as was allotted it. To increase ious that each elector should underthe buildings in the city ukases were issued commanding the various classes of tradespeople and artisans to erect a specified number of houses. The city having originally been built mainly of wood, was several times on the verge of destruction from severe conflagrations. To promote the use of more permanent material, the Czar, by royal decrees, prohibited for a limited time the building of stone houses elsewhere than at St. Petersburg ; and ordered that every vessel coming to the port should bring a certain quantity of stone proportioned to her tonnage. PE-TER never ceased his efforts for the increase, adornment, prosperity and defence of this city of his own creation till his death, which took place in 1725. He was buried in one

Gov. Bigler and the Stump.

Our readers will remember that in 1851, the opposition papers denounced Governor Johnston in unmeasured terms, for neglecting his official dulies and stumping the State, in order to secure his reelection. And within the last few weeks, quite a number of them have said, that although Governor Bigler was justificable in addressing the people at large, three years ago, when he had no public duties to perform, such a course at this time could not be defended; obligations as Governor of Pennsylvania, would require his undivided attention at the sent of government. In the face of these autecedents Mr. Bonham, the chairman of the Democratic State Committee, publishes a letter from his Excellency, from which we make the following extract.

·l have no opinions to disguise on any subject to be the least affected by the elecstand, as far as possible, the effect of the vote which he is about to cast. Besides, my official acts are matters of public concern, and in passing upon their wisdom, justice and policy, the people have a right to all the facts and information that can be thrown before them. I shall, therefore, stand prepared to account for my stewardship by speaking to our party friends in about 37 years. the usual way, or, if prefered, by meeting Judge Pollock before the people, without distinction of party, and discussing political topics, past and present, State and National great and smull.
