DON PEDRO'S STORY.

Imagine to yourself a tall, spare, elderly nan, with dark-gray hair, fiery black eyes, a large Roman nose, and a finely-cut, firm and xpressive mouth, whose walk is slow, proud and erect, and you will have the picture of Don Pedro, de San Montanjo, a Spaniard, whose acquaintance I made, now long years ago, during a short sojourn at a German watering-place. A trifling incident that occurred one morning on one of the public promenades served to bring us, together. From that moment we met frequently, and in the course of a few days we came to spend much of our time together. He was a man of high culture, had seen much of the world, and possessed in an eminent degree that dignified urbanity of manner so characteristic of his race. One evening the dining-room of our hotel. which served also as a cafe, being so full as to render an interchange of confidence impracticable, Don Pedro said to me : "Senor, if you are not to appear under the window of some my apartments." "I shall be most happy," I replied, "as I. nave no appointment to fulfill. I know no ladies here: besides, it is not the custom in ommunicate with one's mistress at the winlow. A quarter of an hour had hardly the rank of major. On the receipt of my comelapsed, when Diego appeared with a silver mission I was to acquaint my father of my candlestick, bowed respectfully, and begged love, and ask his consent to my marriage. me to follow. At the head of the first flight joyfully acceded. Ah, why did I? Should of stairs, Diego opened a door and motioned me to enter. I halted at the threshold surprised. The black coat my old friend usually wore had been changed for a velvet double trimmed with yellow silk, and a red mantillo that fell gracefully over his shoulders. At his side he carried a sword with a golden hilt. He advanced ceremoniously to receive me, extending his withered hand from the ruflles that almost concealed it. "You are welcome, senor," said he. "Do not let the simplicity of my apartments surprise you; when we travel, you know, we cannot have every thing as comfortable as at home. My salon at Madrid presents a somewhat more inviting appearance, and my divans are of real Moorish workmanship. But be seated on this little thing called a sofa. The wines, at least, of our host are pure and good. Be seated, I pray you." With these words, he led me to a sofa before which stood a table well supplied with wines and delicacies. Diego filled our glasses, brought cigars, a light, and retired. As I sat down and took a hasty survey of the room, I observed that the walls were naked, with the exception of a single portrait that hung directy opposite me. It represented a young lady in Spanish costume. A cheerful, blooming face, with clear, loving eyes, a finely-cut mouth, and a soft round chin, stood out lifelike from the canvas. Luxuriant dark hair, and a little hat, ornamented with a white bushy feather, shaded her smooth brow. Her rich robe-which left her finely-moulded neck exposed—and her ornaments of massive gold, discovered alike the lady's refined taste and high social position. I ventured a remark to the extreme beauty of the portrait, and could not refrain from BLACK ALPACAS, in all grades, from the lowest evincing a dessire to know whom it repre-

"I fear you are a little cynical, Don Pedro,' said I: "what you say is sometimes true, no doubt, but is it so in the main? I think not for then that divine spark which penetrates the innermost recesses of the heart, and joins two existences in one, would be a wicked deusion. I must believe in its heavenly origin." He relighted it, drank another glass of Ximenes, and continued : "Soon after my happiness seemed thus insured, I made the acquaintance of a captain in a Swiss regiment, to whom I became at tached, and daily invited to our house. He was a handsome man, with clear, blue eyes, a fair skin, and florid cheeks. He would have appeared somewhat effeminate, perhaps, had he not already distinguished himself on the field by gallant deeds. This made him all the more dangerous among the softer sex. His appearance was so new with us, where the warm sun gives the skin a darker hue, and where blue eyes and light hair are seldom seen. And, when he spoke of the avalanche and eternal snow of his native land, he was listened to with eagerness, and many was the fair lady who essayed to melt the ice of his Northern heart with the fire of her Castilian
