A CASE OF VANITY.

There was a novel case before the Supre Court at New York city a short time ago. Some months since a Mrs. Margaret Killoren, a woman who had accumulated considerable property by hiring men to peddle dry goods for her, arranged with an undertaker to give her a "splendid funeral." She gave him carte blanche as to expense, and the only condition for which she stipulated was that the coffin and other funeral appointments should be in such style as was never before seen in New York. Something of the lady's fastidiousness in regard to the treatment of her mortal remains may be inferred from the fact that she told the undertaker that she had consulted with four women in regard to the construction of her burial roble, but "they were such stupid things" that they had miserably failed to catch her idea. He was anxjously questioned if he knew of any one who could construct a robe suitable for the remains of his fustidious customer, and through his efforts a person was found to whom the order was finally given. The lady died in ductime, and the funeral was conducted without regard to expense or good taste, as she had wished. So far so good. But when the undertaker presented his modest bill of $1,895 to the lady's executor, the executor demurred, and the undertaker was obliged to sue the estate for the amount of his bill. The evidence called out by the trial was regarded by the jury as conclusive in favor of the plaintiff, and a verdict was promptly rendered for the whole amount of the bill in question. The various items of this bill afford a forcible commentary upon the length to which human vanity will go in the matter of vain display, and one is at loss whether most to pity or despise the excessive vanity of a person who carefully arranged all the details of her burial with reference only to the amount of display that could be made and the expense that could be in-

The best we can do is to advise, to urge, and to facilitate, their emigration to places where they are wanted and will be fully employed." There is really sound philosophy in this advice, and we commend the spirit of it to all persons to whom it applies. It seems a little hard sometimes that one cannot live where he wants to, but it is the inevitable and inexorable law of the world that we must adapt ourselves to circumstances, since we cannot always bend and control circumstances according to our own he thought it was rather early in the camwishes. There is work enough in the world for all who are willing to do it, but, all the work cannot be done in Great Britain nor in New York city.
