Our Government seems to be advancing in the road to moral perfection and if it keeps on the occupation of the professional politician will soon be gone. One of the great objects of the new regulations is to secure officials competent to fill the positions under the Government. To secure this the offices are to be formed into groups, and these groups will form a slidling scale, running from highest to lowes in regular succession according to their importance—in a similar manner in which our —The facts we wish considered in view of the same style of article at less than $25 to the same style of article at less than $25 to the same style of article at less than $25 to the grant objects of the formed in the motion of one of the Philadelphia judgment:

If they can do these satisfactorily to the Board of Examiners they are recommended for an appointment in the lowest group, which they get if there is a vacancy. Promotions into the higher groups are made from the next lower group. If han officer in a higher group become physically in capacitated to perform the duties of his office he can be appointed to a position of less importance in a lower group. Thus the Civil Service will be similar in effect to the Army, the Government appointing those to positions who can serve it best and taking care of them after it has employed them, promoting them to vacancies according to their capabilities and in no case recognizing the claim of anybody to a position because he has rendered extraordinary political service.
