nquirers, particularly to young people sceking religious counsel, and in a state of earnest awaker ing. The delicacy and shrinking which pastors f sensibility feel in forcing themselves on relue tant, distant and shut-up people must also be tak into account. The first call is often a great trial to him, as well as to them, and he ofter stays away because there is no indication that he is wanted, or very welcome. This is for the people to think of. Pastors must not underrate their official in favor of their personal importance. minister can often fall back on his office, and do many things in his character as a minister which it is weakness and folly to think he could do only as a friend and neighbor. It is not wise to negect or squander the accumulated power which his office gives him. In the sick room, by the death-bed, at the funeral, to the mourner, the minlster is something more, if he knows it, than an ordinary man. He is the public representative of religion, the chosen teacher, the apostle of Christ, the man whom years in the pulpit have given an official right to handle religion plainly and directly, and he had better not forget nor fall to use his professional privileges and his sacred office as something greater and bolder and more authoritative than his private self. Let him not cly only on his own wisdom or sympathy or tact, out fall back also on his office, and he will meet very unlooked-for welcome, and bestow a very urprising degree of support, consolation and ight, even upon those he fancied had very little respect for his place .- Liberal Christiant.
