THE EXPONENT OF DEMOCRACY. In The "unterrified," or to use the term most musical in their ears, the "red hot" Democracy, found in the person of their great exponent, Brick Poncery, one who by his excreme unreasonableness, his bitter denunciations, and vile slang, has shown himself in every way worthy shof their adoration; and to show their appreciation of genius like his, and their gratitude for his volunteer services in the dirty work of their narty, have so enlarged his subscripnation list that he now, and with reatheir organization. He is fast over-"riding in the matter of influence," all other Democratic journals that have ever made any pretensions to odecency; and as we cannot say anything commendable of a literary "taste that approves his style, we will inot undertake its condemnation, but shall leave it to work out its own salvation under the enlightening influences of the present age. If the filthy expressions in which he luxuriates, were confined to his own columns, less harm would result from their use than is now the case, since the "lesser lights" of Democratic journalism, which must of neregessity, shine by reflection, eagerly gardy, and by their reproduction 3. Seems upon the choice bits of his vul-

It is true that their Eliminaty is confined to those whose addition calibre unfits them for forming a respectable opinion; but no matter, since they have attained cause in which it is attained. But "Brick" doesn't confine his efforts maishing abuse, there are occasions on which he becomes elevated, and his is then that we perceive a noticeable change in the temper of his expressions; his arguments assume a higher tone, for it is then that he indulges in direful threats and portentous declarations.
