

He then protested that he had never been a pirate, that he had never killed a man, and was to suffer for having intended to do so, and that he was brought to this end by having been in a Guinea ship, asking them to beware of a Guinea man. When he had done, and the word was expected from Spencer, he said he could not do it, and requested the commander to do so. He did, so, and the execution took place.

We condense the rest. Capt. McK. addressed the crew. All hands gave, per order, three cheers for the ship, and then were piped to dinner. After dinner, the bodies were committed to the deep. In closing the Report, Capt. McK. praised the officers of the ship, and recommended certain changes and promotions. He took all the responsibility of the execution on himself. All he claimed was that he should not be removed from his command until he had been proved to be unworthy of it.
