COL L. L. TATE,

Dear. Siz-As the time is approaching when the D-motracy of this State will be called upun to select a cambidate for Canal Commissioner, I would recommend to my Damscratic brethren the importance, of selecting a man of undoubted devotion to the principles of our party. It is the course we have to pursue to redeem the Keystone, from the hands of the Spoilers, 1 know such a man, whom I could further recommend as honest and capable. That man is CHARLES CONNER, Eq., of this contribu-A DE HOURAT OF 1805.

Duty to, little Brothers and Sisters.

Henry Miller was a boy who was very kind to his brothers and sisters. I do not believe | e was ever known to do anything for the sake of teasing one of them, or of giving them pain in any way, in his life. It would scarcely seem ever lo have en tored his head to try any of the mischieyous tricks upon them, which some boys, are so ready at contriving. His sisters were never afraid of his putting his cold hand upon their necks, when he came in from his play in the snow, or receiving a sly prick or pinch when the happened[to be standing near them. Their playthings were never concealed for fear of any roguery on the part of Henry. He would take a great deal more pleasure in "sitting down with Jack-knife to make them some new piece of furniture for their baby-house, than Ned Wilkins could possibly have felt, while blacking the doll's face, and turning topsy-turvy the tables and chairs in his sisters' play-room. Henry was as ingenious and witty a boy as Ned. But he chose to exercise bisgingenuity and his wit in a very different way. Ned was continually "contriving some way or other of vexing and tormenting his Twiggs. younger brothers and sisters. At one time while they were quietly amusing themselves together, Ned would contrive to startle them by coming | and scratching upon the door, or making some strange frightful noise. At another time he would go into their play-room, and perpetrate some such piece of mischief with the dolls and furniture, as has already been described. He would seem really to enjoy it, when he could al article of convenience for which she knew she

Henry was always ready to give them any assistances about their school exercises. He never would be thought of a gentleman who was ashamed to be seen amusing his little children, or holding them on his lap, or taking them out to walk? What would any boy think to hear his father speak harshly to his children, or to have him treat them roughly or unkindly, for the sake of being thought manty ? This would be a ridiculous idea. But it is quite as ridiculous for boys to be ashamed of walking out or playing with the younger children. After a boy has been taken care of by his parents during his infancy, and had everything done to made him comfortable and happy, for him to be ashamed to help rainly not so very generous, or noble, or manly .-Do you thing it is boys !- Every Day Duty.
