The Present Age.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, has been distinguisned for the rapid advance of the Arts and it is democratic. Mr. Johnston is in a light place the field. It may be called a bouch impulse— the present month. It affords me true of their passage—and to him officially they Sciences, and the extension of civilization and and he writhes and wriggles like a special pleahuman happiness. It would seem that the wisdom and experience of every proceeding age have contributed to accelerate the march of improvement. In no period of the world's history can man boast of such intellectual, moral and mechanical advancement.

Look back twenty years and note the progress. of human invention. Then the mighty power of steam was in its infancy; then railroads if conat the tune of forty miles per hours.

Where and when will discovery end, or what it is yet destined to accomplish, immagination cannot conceive; unless, indeed, we place in the farthest verce, the perfectibility of the human race. If morality and religion kept race with the progress of invention, we might confidently look for such a consumation a but the piece is unequal, We cannot however shut our even to the fact that the world grows waser and better. Among civitlized nations wars have nearly ceased, and the umpire of reason and lounamity are appealed to, The law of stations serves as a common bomithroughout christenium-a violation of which is visited with disgrace. Christianity, simulated by missionary enterprize, is wrining its way into the darkest regions, and bids fair to revolutionize nations as it does men. Despotism is relaxing her grasp, and rational liberty is extending her conquests. Having sketched some of the characteristics of the present age, we shall again resume this pleasant subject
