

Agricultural.

How does the farmer's simple life? How pure the joy it yields? Far from the world's temptations, strife, Press, and the world's noise.

Agricultural Maxims.

- 1. Manure is the basis of agricultural prosperity and success.
2. Crops are always in direct proportion to the manure which the farmer uses.
3. Of all manure there is none so valuable and important as stable manure; it agrees best with all kinds of soil and plants and modes of culture.
4. Even if other more energetic manures be employed, this cannot wholly be dispensed with and they should be used rather to augment its action than to replace it.
5. Those manures are not in sufficient quantity or so universal as to supersede the use of stable manure—and, as a general thing, cultivation would be impossible without the aid of this latter.
6. It is not the largest era which gives the most profit, but that which is the best tilled, and especially the best manured.
7. A small farm well cultivated and well manured, will give a greater clear profit than a large one, where the same labor and the same quantity of manure are employed on a greater extent of surface.
