He remarked that he had always been a warm friend of the South, but that was onarms; but while that section of the Contude he would meet it only with cold steel. The disintegration of this glorious Union was, to his mind, a thing much more to be regretted than the shedding of blood. It had cost much blood and treasure, and so help him God he would never part with it for less than it cost.

He held every man to be his brother who stood up in defence of that flag, but he who trampled upon and endeavored to disgrace it was a traitor of the deepest dye. This Union must be preserved though eve ry man this side of the Arctic regions portion of democrats now in the service of should perish in the attempt to maintain the United States Government.
