To the Herors of America-

BY JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE. Oh, hall to the heroes whose deeds have restored Our honor unsulfied once more.

And the blaze of their valer triumphantly poured

And the heavens were shrouded in wrath, Till the sons of the battle, like stars of the storm, Then plume thy dark pinion, proud bird of the north!

And sweep from thy home in the skies.
On the wings of the whirlwind, exultingly forth,
To the plain where the enemy dies. And joy thee, my cou try! thy stains are effaced.

The pride of the box-ter is low.

And the deep suffied similar by cowards disgraced,
Is washed in the gore of the for. And thou, starry banner ! look proudly again

Nor dark-n thy beam though it fall on the slain. Who repuse on the death-hed of fame; For the halo that circles the tombs of the brave Its lustre unfading maintains,

Soon or Late.-An Appeal.

Among the four or five millions of grown men in the loyal States, there is possibly one in a hundred-we hope not so many -who has made gold his god, and who, therefore, will do nothing for his country, but, if interest so bid, will work treacher ou-ly against her. There is, now and then a cold, petty spirit, shut in by its own daily narrowing walls, and whose heart the slow fires of selfishness have long since shrivelled into ashes. He too, will stand alcof. There creeps, here and there, a natural coward, who, like Morrison in Rob Roy, would, under any conditions, bug the "poor boon of life"-live anywhere, live anyhow, though life was not worth living. Let them all go! The wretches are not wanted.
