CHAFFING HAY AND CORN STALKS ECONOMY.

A Great deal of pro and con has of late been published on the economy of cauffing corn stglks and hay as food for boy ines and horses. The vetern John John- Ualices, ston says he has tried it, and the increase did not say the matting; and for the same reason he never grows a patch of roots for the delectation of his milk cows in winter. But what is fair economy for Mr. Johnston on his large and very productive farm, should not be practiced by the small farmer who is at less expense for labor, and is necessarily obliged to make the most of every vegetable product.

In the March Farmer, we read of a Groce Connecticut farmer who has brought up a worn out farm to keep thirty head of bovines, that would keep only six or eight head before. He not only chaffed his well saved stalks, but he steamed them also, with meal, oil cake, bran. etc.; soiling his cattle in summer, by BOG which means he was enabled to make 750 loads of composted manure yearly. This not only manured his corn, but topdressed his medows.

But there is an advantage gained to the wheat-growing farmer in the fineness of the manure from cut feed. Joseph Wright of Waterloo had a field of 20 acres of season in this country; while all other crops were short from freezing, his was saved by a liberal coat of fine manure from cut stalks, which formed a mulch for the wheat, thus performing the office of the leaves and vegetable humus of a CALICOE, new clearing.

At almost all the large livery stables in New England and New York, the hay and stalks fed to horses is chafled fine and treated with ground corn, oats, etc., by which a great saving is made in hay, which in all large towns is much dearer than grain in proportion to its nutriment. Sugars, It is said to have been fully ascertained by repeated experiments in England, that nincteen pounds of cut hay will take the place of twenty-five pounds in the long state.

A pains-taking correspondent of the · omnibus and rail-road stables in New York, the hay is cut fine and mixed wet with corn and oats ground, in the pro-portion by measures of oats, the propor tion varying only with cit. tion varying only with the market price of the grain. The proportion fed of cut hay to gain is generally nine pounds of hay to seventeen of grain, avering ten guarts of meal a day to the largest horse. Spring Goods
