

When to Cut Timothy Grass.

We find Dr. Kirtland's contribution to Mr. Flint's book on Grasses and Forage Plants very appropriately quoted at this time by the Prairie Farmer of the 4th, and as it will be read with peculiar inter-

"Timothy grass is a perennial plant, which renews itself by annual formation of bulbs, or perhaps more correctly speaking, tubers, in which the vitality of the plant is concentrated during the winter.—

These form in whatever locality the plant is selected, without reference to dryness or moisture. From these proceed the stalks which support the leaves and head, and from the same source spread out the numerous fibres forming the true roots.

2. To ensure a perfect developement of tubers, a certain amount of nutrition must be assimilated in the leaves, and returned

3. As soon as the process of nutrition is completed, it becomes manifest by the appearance of a state of desiccation, or last portion of the stalk that yields up its freshness is that adjoining the head. Coincident with the beginning of this process, is the full developement of the seeds, and with its progress the mature. 5. The tubers, together with one or two of the lower joints of the stalk, remain fresh and green during the winter, if left to take their natural course, but if, by any means, this green portion be severed, at any season of the year, the result will be the death of the plant.

From these five propositions the follow ing conclusions are drawn :

I. That Timothy grass cannot, under any circumstruces, be adapted for pasture; as the close nipping of horses and sheep is fatal to the tubers, which are also extensively destroyed by swine it allowed to run in the pasture.

2. That the proper time for mowing Timothy is at any time after the process of desiceation has commenced on the stalk as noted in the third proposition. It is not very essential whether it is performed a week earlier or later, provided it be postponed till that evidence of maturity has become manifest.

3. All attempts at close shaving the sward should be avoided, while using the seythe, and in gauging mowing machines. care should be taken to run them so high that they will not cut the Timothy below the second joint above the tuber."

Mr. Flint says ;-"I have frequently, during the past autumn pulled up the bulbous roots of timothy from the stubble from which a heavy crop can be cut with the scythe, while in flower, for the purpose of studying the changes which were taking place in in these tubers, and have found them very similar to those represented in the 3d and 4th propositions, not only on moist, damp soils, but also on ON AND AFTER MONDAY, JUNE 12th, 1865. soils comparatively dry. Any farmer can satisfy himself of the correctness of these representations by a little observation in his own fields: and as the point is of practical importance, it is worthy of careful attention .- Boston Cultivator.
