Children are delighted to study Geography by this system. They learn so rapidly and receive such cleant impressions of the schiped, that it is a pleasure's to both teacher and pu-pil to be engaged in it. We all know that a better and more lasting idea of a locality is obtained by looking at a bold and distinct drawing of it, than by volumes of descrip-tion. If a man wants to get an exact idea of a farm he has been purchasing, he learns more by one icok at the draft on the back of the deed, than by reading the description in-side twenty times. This is the great princi-ple of Pelton's system of Geography, and three are others equally practical combined with it which entitle it to the reputation it sustains, as the best and quickest mode of teaching Geography, yet introduced.
