A BEAUTIFUL POEM.-When Hood's "Bridge of Sighs" came like a wailing spirit through the world of letters, human affection and ous pathos. It was the richest gem in the wild with mirth over his flashes of unequalled wit, were at once transferred to the humid realm of tears by the pathetic imagery of the "Bridge of Sighs" It was fit and right that Hood's memory should be embalmed in an imitation of his own charming poem, and how happily and exquisitely it has The lines are from the pen of the Hon. Samuel Rush, a son of Dr. Benjamin Rush, one of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, and are alike creditable to his geivs and the tender sensibilities of his heart. So impressed have we been with their beauty that we have almost felt unwilling to see them placed in so ephemeral a niche, as the columns of a rural newspaper. We sincerely hope, however, they will eventually meet with that preservation which they are honorably entitled to receive, for we are sure they are scarcely less beautiful than those they so closely and touchingly imitate.
