The Pittsburgh Gazette.

Pittsburgh, Friday Evening, April 4, 1851.

Mr. Webster's Speech.

We have received the speech of Mr. Webster, delivered in the Senate of the United States, on the 17th ult., in reply to Mr. Calhoun, and have read it with great interest. It is a calm, dignified, and able production, and will be read with pleasure by all parties. Mr. Webster's speech is addressed to the whole country, and not to any particular section. He speaks as an American statesman, and not as a Northern or Southern man. He has no sectional feelings to gratify, and no sectional prejudices to conciliate. He looks upon the Union as a whole, and upon the interests of the whole country as identical. He has no fears for the Union, and no apprehensions that it will be dissolved. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly predicting its dissolution, and who are doing all they can to bring it about. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly threatening to dissolve the Union, and who are doing all they can to bring about a dissolution. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly complaining of grievances, and who are doing all they can to create grievances. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Constitution, and who are doing all they can to destroy it. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Government, and who are doing all they can to overthrow it. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Union, and who are doing all they can to break it up. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Laws, and who are doing all they can to render them inoperative. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Courts, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Executive, and who are doing all they can to render him powerless. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Legislature, and who are doing all they can to render it contemptible. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Judiciary, and who are doing all they can to render it odious. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Press, and who are doing all they can to destroy its influence. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Pulpit, and who are doing all they can to bring it into contempt. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Bar, and who are doing all they can to bring it into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Medical Profession, and who are doing all they can to bring it into disgrace. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Mercantile Community, and who are doing all they can to bring it into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Mechanics, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Agriculturists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Laboring Classes, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Poor, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Rich, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Whigs, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Democrats, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Abolitionists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Slavery Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Pro-Slavery Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Free Soilers, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Conservatives, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Radicals, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Ultras, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Moderates, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Extremists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Compromisers, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Union Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Disunionists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Secessionists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Nullifiers, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Fanatics, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Traitors, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Rebels, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Revolutionists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anarchists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Tories, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Aristocrats, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Democrats, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Republicans, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Federalists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Federalists, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Tyler Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Tyler Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Clay Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Clay Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Calhoun Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Calhoun Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Webster Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Webster Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Cass Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Cass Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Buchanan Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Buchanan Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Dallas Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Dallas Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Wilmot Men, and who are doing all they can to bring them into disrepute. He has no sympathy with those who are constantly finding fault with the Anti-Wilmot