> For the "Star and Banner." To Ella.

will: I know a broad vale in a far off land, Where lies a sweet spot, near my childhood's hom. There's a gentle mound near the ocean strand, Where the sea-breeze delights in zephyra to roam. There's a forest grove on the top of that mound. And mountain and sea meet the eye all around. Round the time-worn trunk of an old oak tree, A rich flowered vine has closely entwined. North its widely-spread boughs, enclosed, you a This green grassy grave, and stands all alone, And nothing but "Ella" is marked on the stone Oh! I love to steal in the twilight gray. Oh: a tove to steat in the twingin gray.
And sedly gaze on that quiet, plain grave—
To muse on those hours long since passed away.
Now buried, alsa! 'neath time's deep wave—
And the aptrit of Ella seems wandering free, As I repeated each leaf of her memory.

Oh I I remember the bright Sabbath morn— At the star she stord—a pale sweet bride— The flowing veil—a white wreath to adora A brow that I prayed no ill to betide. I bear now the murmur that rose from the crowd.

As her virtue and beauty were whispered aloud.

No fear then bedowed her dark pensive eye. Her bearing was firm-the passive and tame ; But I marked the swell of a pent-up sigh-The shudder that ran o'er her trembling frame. Her form to the altar there did meekly how, But her fips moved not to the dread solemn vow Ah! sadly I turnd from the gay young throng, As thought sped far through the vists of years; For I knew too well that the grave e're long Would end her crush'd hopes and allence her fear The story I heard of a parent's command, That exultingly pledged her unwilling hand.' I think of the eve when her tears flowed free-As the told the tale of her soul's pure love— The tie that had boundher, she must obey. That kindness and time must remedies prove. Ah! yes, it has proved the cure of that wow, That feld her a victim in the cold grave now. Oh I often I gaze on that parent's face, Who had her obey to wed another-And the withered hopes you can plainly trace.
O'de the deep seamed brow of that stern mother.
And day after day she weeps all alone— The cry breaks forth-my own Elia, my own ! And all, where is he to whom she could give The freshness and love of her kind pure soul! Does a stone mark the spot—or does he live In a sex of wos that brooks no control? He live—and his foot steps are often led At this cain hour to sweet Ella's bed. At this caun nour to awest Eila's bed.
When the mist is sleeping on yonder hill,
And the stars keep watch in yon cold him sky.
When the nighthirds scream echoes loud and shrill,
Huthed is each ear and closed each livery rye.
Mitthis members have Them to his professional. Mist his wandering he'll turn in his spirit free, To think of thee, Ella, to think of thee.
