Where'er such heart | find; That throbs with love for home, for friend, For country, and markind. "Let me Sleep."

"Let me sleep," sid my companion, half petrishly turning from my couch.— "Let me sleep." The words haunted my memory for hours. How often has the wish been uttered in this weary world .-Oh! let me sleep.

The man whose conscience lashes bim for misdeeds-evils committed and repented of-cries, as he droops his head on his thorny pillow, "let me sleep-with sleep omes oblivion." The mourner, who has seen some bright and beautiful one faded from his embrace, like a beautiful summer flower nipt by a too early frost, bows his head above the prostrate form below him, and sighs in the agony of his mind, "Let me sleep! sleep with the loved one whose
