In the orange and grapefruit groves owned by members of the Florida Citrus Exchange the pickers wear white gloves to protect the fruit from bruises and contaminations.

They clip—not pull—the fruit from the trees and carefully lay it in canvas lined baskets. The wagons in which the fruit is conveyed to the packing houses have springs that prevent bruises on the way from the groves.

At the packing houses the oranges and grapefruit are washed by machinery and assorted for size, wrapped in tissue paper and carefully packed in boxes—all by white-gloved workers. No child labor is employed in any packing house of the Exchange.

No human hand touches the fruit from tree to the grocery or home in which the box is unpacked. This insures the consumer fruit handled in the most sanitary manner and the care taken with it means that it will keep well. You can safely buy it by the box.

Florida Oranges and Grapefruit Untouched by any Human Hands From the Tree To the Consumer

The Florida Citrus Exchange is a co-operative, non-profit making association of orange and grapefruit growers formed for the mutual protection of consumers, dealers and producers.

The mark of the Exchange in red on boxes and wrappers means tree-ripened, sweet, juicy, well-flavored fruit. No matter what grade you buy you will get more for your money if you insist on Exchange fruit.

Up-to-date grocers and fruit dealers in practically every city and town have for sale Florida Citrus Exchange oranges and grapefruit. Your dealer probably will have the fruit in stock.

Tell him firmly that you want Exchange fruit—that while other oranges and grapefruit may be good; those with the red mark of the Exchange on the boxes and wrappers are sure to be. Should you have any trouble in getting this fruit, please write to
