Imprison Broody Hens, But Don't Starve Them

It is often a big job to persuade a broody hen that she should keep on laying eggs rather than stop to bring up a large family. The best way to discourage her in this ambition is to remove her quarters lacking the necessary conveniences for hatching. Remove the broody hen to roomy and comfortable quarters where there are no nests or places to make them. A small, open-fronted shed, guarded by poultry netting and fitted with roosts, serves the purpose very well. Supplied with plenty of water and food, they are kept here until they stop clucking, when they are put back with the general flock.

Many poultry houses are provided with boxes having slatted fronts and bottoms. Here the broody hen is confined until her dream of caring for a family is forgotten, or abandoned at least. Such uncivil practice as starving the hen or ducking her in cold water is wholly uncalled for.

A complete change of environment, with humane consideration for the hen, will probably bring about the desired result as quickly as it can be accomplished in any way. Don't delay the start; it will make your task all the harder.

Remedy Proposed For Care of Lousy Hens

With the approach of Spring the lice problem will scone be more serious to contend with than it is through the winter. The customary way of holding lice in check is to dust the hens with some sort of lice powder such eggs as a real relative to the State convention and parade to be held in that city and a rule destroy the eggs, so that willing a rule destroy the eggs, so that willi

TREATING FROZEN COMBS

Slight frosting of combs and wattles will probably not interfere with the use of males in the breeding pens, but in severe cases the pain and sore ness may make the birds unfit for use. There is little that can be done in the way of treatment; if discovered early, the frozen part should be thawed out with snow. Healing will be hastened if badly frozen portions of the comb are cut away, and the wound kept greased with carbolized vaseline in 5 per cent. strength.

DOGS QUARANTINED

Waynesboro, Pa., March 7.—Dr. D. Ryder, acting for the State Livestock Sanitary Board, has placed four more chambersburg dogs in quarantine for low days. The dogs are supposed to have been bitten by the Eby dog that died a few days ago with rables. Dr. Ryder also learned that the dog had bitten eleven dogs in Fayetteville. These dogs were also placed under quarantine.
