Harrisburg Boy Picked on All Star Basketball Team

Selected by Brooklyn Eagle For Position of Left Forward; Jackson, of Princeton, in Line-up

In an interesting review of the college basketball season, the Brooklyn Eagle picks Edward J. Stackpole, Jr., a Harrisburg boy, on the all-star team, and says:

"The Eagle's 1913-14 All-American teams were selected after getting the opinions of several well-known college coaches. The two quintets undoubtedly are the strongest that could be selected, and compare favorably with the honor teams of former years.

"Jackson of Princeton and Stackpole of Yale stand out as the leading forwards of the year. The former was the find of the campaign, and put up a slashing exhibition in all the games. In the ten contests in the league tournament he tallied 65 points, 15 field baskets and 35 from the foul line. He was an ideal shot, was very speedy and an excellent defensive player.

"Stackpole was among the league's leaders in the number of field baskets tallied, which is convincing proof of his scoring ability. He averaged close to three baskets to a game, which is a fairly creditable record in these days of close guarding. He was of the aggressive type of forward, and was a hard worker. His ability to dodge made him a hard man to handle, and he frequently had the opposing guards completely at sea."
