

Women AND THEIR INTERESTS LITTLE BOBBIE'S PA.

By WILLIAM F. KIRK

Pa took me with him when he went hunting last week. We stayed at a little bit of a hotel that was rite on the edge of the woods. It was ran by an old man, nearly seventy years old, but he looked young in his eyes & he was as spry as Pa. Only he didn't have any round stummock on him like Pa's stummock. He told me when I asked him why he stayed so slim that he had to work pretty hard all his life & that he didn't have any time to grow fat.

Then I calm hoam, too late, & I have been here with my mountains ever since. I have beecum wealthy, the old man told me, but I am afraid I can never be as happy as I wud have been if I had stayed ware I was born.

VERY MUCH LIKE THE SAILOR SUITS Dainty Shades of Pink or Blue Pique Make Up Prettily For Summer

Wudent you like to go back to the city and see a show? I asked the old man. My deer little man, he sed, shows are for the young. There is nothing new in the city for me to see, nothing but the old streets that I used to roam oaver wen I was making my grato mistake. They may have changed, but the saim ground is under them that I used to walk over. I am happier here.

8198 Girl's Long Waisted Dress, 4 to 8 years.

Here is a new and charming little frock that combines the sailor and the Japanese ideas. The sleeves are cut in one with the body portion yet the collar is cut after the true sailor model. Altogether the dress is just as pretty as can be and, at the same time, absolutely simple.

MEAT INJURIOUS TO THE KIDNEYS

We are a nation of meat eaters and our blood is filled with uric acid, says a well-known authority, who warns us to be constantly on guard against kidney trouble. The kidneys do their utmost to free the blood of this irritating acid, but become weak from the overwork; they get sluggish; the eliminative tissues clog and thus the waste is retained in the blood to poison the entire system.

Their Married Life

By MABEL HERBERT URNER

The lighted stained-glass windows of the church shone dimly through the rain. They turned up the brick walk and made their way around under the dripping trees to the side entrance, where the light flooded out.

of a riding habit, so they had faked one out of an old linen suit, that Jean might make her entry consistent with her speech.

"No danger of anybody around here swiping an umbrella?" asked Warren facetiously, as he deposited his in the corner.

It was a long speech, full of flowery phrases about her "glorious" ride through the hills and dales, the prairie breezes and the sky dappled with clouds. She gave it as though it were a commencement recitation, and in the same high pitched voice.

"I guess you'll find it safe, sir." Then with a glance at the overcrowded hattracks, "You can put your wraps in the chapel, if you like."

Hardly had Texana cleared the table after the two-minute breakfast, when there was a knock that Jack Maxie flimsy door, and in came Jack Maxie. He had just dropped his program and clapped uproariously.

"Dear, you see we're not late," whispered Helen triumphantly, as free from their wraps they now entered the lecture room.

Maxwell was tall and thin, with a voice surprisingly deep in contrast to the high-pitched tones of the girls. He evidently took his part most seriously, and Helen thought that once or twice he looked out in annoyance at Warren's ill-concealed chuckles.

"Oh, isn't this too near?" for they were almost against the "orchestra," which consisted of a piano and a violinist, who was now playing up.

The play was undoubtedly written by an eminent playwright of the Cinnamon Club, and its amateurish lines combined with the amateur acting, produced a real comedy.

"Hush, dear, not so loud," for Warren's gruff undertone sounded startlingly loud amid the decorous, subdued whisperings.

When the red curtain hitched to after the final touching scene, Warren went straight for the door beside the stage. Feeling that they had no right to intrude behind the scenes, Helen hung back, but he beckoned to her abruptly. Reluctantly she followed, feeling self-conscious and very much out of place.

"The Cinnamon Club Presents THE WINNER WINS. A Comedy of the West. Lecture Room of the First Church, Millford, Conn.

He bowed formally to Helen when Warren cleared her, but he evinced none of the hearty good-fellowship that Helen had naturally expected.

"Here's Max," chuckled Warren, pointing to the fourth character, "Bert Clifford, the Ardent Lover—J. C. Maxwell. The ardent lover! That's rich! Hardly spoke to a girl in his life."

A number of the audience had made their way back to congratulate the actors. And of all sides were heard gushing comments of how "splendidly" the play had "gone off," and how "beautifully" every one had acted.

"The furnishing of the 'living room' consisted of a table set for breakfast, four chairs, a couch, a few knick-knacks and an Indian blanket hung on the wall to give the 'western' atmosphere.

With a brief good-by they went back to the dim chapel for their wraps. Helen's cheeks were burning with a fierce resentment. She could hardly wait until they were outside before she broke out indignantly.

"Mrs. Perkins—Good morning, Texana. I see you have flowers on the table this morning." Texana (bobbing and grinning)—"Mornin', Mis' Perkins. Yes, I wanted to have things look purty. I reckon like as not Miss Jean'll come courtin' long o' Miss Jean today."

"Well, he may be a little sore. I've gived him pretty hard about that play. But Max's a good fellow—he's all right. He'll come around."

"Then Mrs. Perkins came on in boots and riding breeches, and they sat down to breakfast. "Why that's real coffee," whispered Helen as Mrs. Perkins poured out the coffee steaming hot.

Warren grinned. "Guess they need some sort of brace to get through this play."

Then the door was thrown open and "Jean—the girl from the East" burst in. Apparently the Cinnamon Club had not wanted to go to the expense of a riding habit, so they had faked one out of an old linen suit, that Jean might make her entry consistent with her speech.
