When the Panama Canal tolls fight was resumed in the House to-day the battle lines were drawn in this manner: Forty-five minutes remained for debate on the special rule to limit discussion to twenty hours on the Sims bill to repeal the exemption for coastwise ships.

Chairman Henry, of the rules committee, leading that phase of the fight for the administration forces, was ready at the conclusion of the fifty-five minutes to "move the previous question," a parliamentary maneuver to shut off debate on the rule and force a vote, the first real test of strength.

Opponents of the administration program, strengthened by Speaker Clark's vigorous denunciation of the attempt at cloture and renewed by his declaration that he would vote against limiting debate, were prepared to bring every resource into play to beat "the previous question" and thus throw down the bars for unlimited debate not only on the rule but on the repeal bill itself.

On this first test vote hung not only the question of pressing the administration measure through but also the greater one of opening it to amendment, for the rule proposed that only one amendment may be permitted to intervene—and that would be one motion to recommitt to the commerce committee.

Administration leaders realized that if beaten on the cloture rule the bill itself would be open to amendments, one of which gaining favor to-day was to repeal the exemption but to specifically provide that the right to grant free passage to American ships under existing treaties should not be surrendered.

In this way the opposing forces were drawn up to renew one of the bitterest congressional fights of recent years, certainly the hardest fought of this contest, in which party lines have been broken, and Democrats, Republicans and Progressives divided into two camps under banners proclaiming either for or against repeal of the exemption.

Sudden Adjournment The defection of such Democratic party leaders as Speaker Clark, Representative Underwood, Chairman Fitzgerald, of the appropriations committee, and other party leaders, support served to make the fight more bitter. President Wilson received early reports from his supporters at the White House and was confident that his arguments that he was asking a man to change his opinions, but to correct a situation, would win the day.

The sudden adjournment of the House last night when only fifty-five minutes more would have brought the first test vote was variously interpreted. Speaker Clark's vigorous statement denouncing the rule received various constructions among close observers of the political situation. Senator Chamberlain, leading Republican opponent in the Senate, was elated at the situation in the House.

"I was lonely when I started this fight," he said, "but we are gaining strength every day. It's going to be the old battle of 75 or 80 years ago. Tory element on one side and the masses of the people on the other."

Administration leaders continued to express confidence in the outcome of the controversy, predicting a substantial majority for the repeal. Some told the President to-day they would have a majority of fifty on the rule.

Administration leaders in the House went into executive session with Representatives

Representative Adamson to plan the fight. Those who attended were Representatives Shirley, Adamson, Harwick, Foster, Flood, Henry, Covington, Sims, Hay and Palmer.

Some congressmen professed the view that the fight had taken the aspect of a contest between the President and Speaker Clark. They expressed the Speaker might take the floor to personally lead the fight on the rule, or might reserve his attack for the bill itself, unless forced to the floor to defend himself.

Representative Sherwood, Republican, of Ohio, was the first speaker. He urged an amendment to dismantle the fortifications of the canal and absolutely neutralize it.

Mr. Adamson denigrated the results, he must take his place and share the odium and responsibility for whatever disaster may come.

Speaker Clark revolds Against President Wilson Washington, D. C., March 27.—Speaker Clark has openly joined the revolt in Congress against the administration's stand for the repeal of the tolls exemption clause in the Panama Canal act.

He has also injected into the controversy the issue of whether or not the Democrats will submit to the old Republican gag rule and agree to limit the House debate on the tolls question to twenty hours, for which the administration forces are working.

CECIL A. PRESTON Valuation Engineer of the Pennsylvania Railroad

Within the next two weeks the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will begin work on computing the physical examination of this great system.

To direct this important inquiry the Pennsylvania Railroad directors have selected a gentleman well known to Harrisburgers, Cecil A. Preston, former superintendent of the Middle Division, with headquarters at Altoona.

Valuation offices have been opened in the Commercial Trust Building, at Philadelphia, and an army of clerks will shortly take up the task of estimating the real value of the Pennsylvania system.

Mr. Preston will be known as valuation engineer. He will make frequent trips over the main line, and will come to Harrisburg at intervals. At present he is completing plans for taking up the important work with the Interstate Commerce representatives.
