Aunt Este's Stories For Children

Have you ever heard of the mocking bird? It is really quite wonderful. So listen closely to the story of

Madam Mocking Bird, Concert Singer

Once upon a time there was great confusion in the beautiful woods of Carolina. In the lofty branches of the long-leaved pines and in the oaks and hiskorys was a great chattering.

There talking to and fro were the Red Bird, the Jay, the Vireos, the Cat Bird, the Wood Robin, and many others.

"Who is going to hear Madam Mocking Bird to-night?" asked one of the birds.

"Well," answered a saucy little Blue Jay, "daddy brought home three tickets for us to go, and I surely am going to be on hand in the very front seat, for she is perfectly wonderful. I have never heard any bird better in song vaudeville than she is."

"H'm!" sneered the Red Bird, "I wouldn't give a fig to hear her. Why you can hear her stunts any day by just keeping your ears open as you fly through the woods—she only imitates everything she hears."

ears open as you fly through the woods—she only imitates everything she hears."

"Only imitates everything she hears?" interrupted Mrs. Cat Bird. "ONLY?—I should say she is wonderful to do that. I should like to hear you sing in a different way each minute—all you can do is give a mellow whistle, my dear Red Bird, just as I only can meow like a cat—and just as neighbor Woodpecker only can give his shrill call. But Madam Mocking Bird! Oh, she is quite wonderful indeed; and I think it a treat to hear her. Of course, only those who are jealous of her power will stay at home."

And so it happened that the beautiful Forest Theater was crowded on the night that Madam Mocking Bird gave her concert. Never was there a more gorgeous audience. The gowns couch it white of the gowns would be a stay of the stay of the stay of the great Bird Prima Donna.

At last through the forest came floating the cry of the Whip-poor-will. Faintly from the back of the wonderful restage, the louder and louder.

"Is Whip-poor-will, Faintly from the back of the wonderful tree stage, the louder and louder." It whole poor-will so this program too," asked one little Woodpecker of his mother. "I thought the concert was to be given by Madam Mocking Bird only."

"And so it is, you little goose," answered his mother, "just keep quiet and listen and you will hear some more birds."

And sure enough very suddenly the cry changed and the whole bird audience thrilled as they heard the tones of the Bob White.—Bob White, "good heard from the tree stage—followed by the screams of the Pigeon Hawk.

And then before all the vast number of birds appeared Madam Mocking Bird, wearing her beautifully striped wings and her long tail feathers. She bowed right and left to the thundering applause from tiny throats, and then from out her own small throat came sounds beautiful and tender—the notes and songs of the sweeter-voiced birds. Then gradually rising higher, her voice took up the songs of the Thrush, and the lones of the Robin, and the Blue Bird.

"Wonderful," sighed all the little birds in the au-

Robin, and the Blue Bird.

"Wonderful, wonderful," sighed all the little birds in the audience as she stopped for a moment. "They are beautifully rendered. But I wish she'd give something of her own."

And sure enough the next number of the bird prima donna was all her own. In fine, original tones, beautiful and pleasing, she sang a song different from any bird of the forest. On and on she warbled until the pale moon grew brighter in the wonderful sky overhead, and still her audience sat breathless. At last she ceased, and bowing low darted into a little recess of the shady oak.

she ceased, and bowing low darted into a little recess of the shady oak.

Then there came the applause, long and loud, from many tiny throats. It was as if the woods echeed, "Curtain Call, Curtain Call."

Timidly Madam Mocking Bird came forth to bow before her audience.

"This is my closing night in Carolina," said she. "And I thank all my little friends for the way they have applauded my work. I now start on a tour of Louisana, Pennsylvania and I even expect to strike Boston. I hope I may be able to learn while I am gone some new songs of birds you do not hear down in the Southland. I hope to be able to give you a correct imitation of their song when I return.

As the little bird audience filed away, sleepy and tired, to their wee nest homes, Madam Mocking Bird laid a drowsy bird heard on a downy hair pillow in a little nest hotel.

"It is wonderful to be able to please so many people," said she. "I am tired, but I thin: I should be a very thankful bird—that I've been given a talent to make others happy."
