Aunt Este's Stories For Children

My dear little ones:

I want to tell you a dear little fairy tale of a dear little caterpillar who found his way into birdland — so listen to the story of FUZZY CATERPILLAR IN WONDERLAND

FUZZY CATERPILLAR IN WONDERLAND

One bright summer day the birds and bees and flowers of Wonderland were having a picnic. Everywhere in that happy world was sunshine and perfume and song. All of a sudden Robin peeped from the little twig swing where he sat singing a love the sunshine and perfume and song. All of a sudden Robin peeped from the little twig swing where he sat singing a love the win, and the sunshine and perfume and song. All of a sudden Robin peeped from the little twig swing where he sat singing a love the word of the sunshine and take a long nap.

Robin moved a trifle closer to Jenny, as one does when excited by wonder or awe, as he saw Fuzzy stretch himself, traw fuzzy, really and truly, for no one else had ever been inside that queer bed, as Robin knew. Still he hardly could believe his own eyes, for this creature looked more like a cross between a bird and an angel, as he spread his brilliant gauze wings in the sunlight.

"I don't suppose they're really truly wings like ours," said Jenny, as they watched. "They are too light and airy." But just then Fuzzy flew, and Jenny knew they were the real thing, and that just as sure as Fuzzy had once been a worm, now he was a butterfuly.

"Let's go over and get acquainted," said Cock Robin. "It'll be lots of fun to introduce him to the new friends, the birds and bees and flowers. We will take him to the picnic.

So Fuzzy felt very much flattered when a handown bornet and sown, flew up to where news sitting on a small projecting twice fellow I used to meet occasionally when I was hunting tood form by bables? I am sure it was you who went into that cocoon bed—so it must have been you who came out. But you look so different in your new dress.

"I am the same, kind sir," said Fuzzy, with a low bow; never taking his eyes from the beautiful little lady in brown." "We have come to introduce y

When he reached the picnic grounds he almost felt he had reached the skyland. It was all so different from what he had been used to. There was not the damp, murky smell of the brown earth, which somehow or other he had never been able to enjoy while he had been a worm: there was no gossipling; no ruining of plants and apples in this beautiful wonderland into which he was being introduced. (He did not hear a vague rumor that Robin liked cherries a little too well to suit the farmer—but every one was very nice about it, and talked as little as possible of this one fault of the gorgeous bird). There was just music and laughter and service in this happy place. Why even while they were pienicing, the bees were gathering honey for their store houses, the flowers were cherring the children who passed their way, and the birds were singing happy carols for the sick folk who gazed on them from open windows.

"It is, indeed, Wonderland," said Fuzzy. "It was well worth trying for. I have seen enough to-day to make me glad I was a worm if I had the making of anything like this in me."

Just then there was a grand chorus of happy voices.

"Speech! Speech!" they shouted. "We want to hear from our little friend who just to-day came into Wonderland, and whom Robin says was once little Fuzzy Caterpillar."

My, poor Fuzzy was embarrassed. But he spread his wings, made a bow and began—although in very low tones at first, because he really was not used to being in such a wonderful assembly. To think of being called upon to make a speech to all the beautiful dwellers in Wonderland. But when he had begun, it was all very simple—the thoughts seemed to come as easily as his wings had when he really tried. And this is what he said:

"Dear little friends of Wonderland;"

"Dear little friends of Wonderlands;
Dear birds and bees and flowers—
I've dreamed and planned a long, long while
Of these bright happy hours.
I worked and thought and prayed and strove
To grow a bit like you;
The thoughts I hid beneath my fuzz
No living creature knew.
But now I'm happy as can be,
And I ask you—one and all—
Is it not most wonderful to fly
When I only used to craw!"

"Welcome to Wonderland," shouted the birds and bees and flowers, as Fuzzy finished. "Welcome to Happyland," echoed in Fuzzy's mind as he flew away to see more of this Wonderland, which, from now on was to be his dwelling place.

"Life is indeed worth while" contentedly sighed Fuzzy,
Lovingly,
AUNT ESTE.
