midst of his carousing, to preach repentance to Ninmah in the heyday of his prideful wickedness, to turn Israel to righteousness and spirituality in the day of its religious arrogance and hardened heart—all these attempts are of a kind. There is something sublimely futile about the eager efforts of Jesus, on the last day of His appearance to His nation, as He strove by picture and story and appeal to call His beloved nation to a realization of its fast-disappearing day of opportunity.

The national aspect of the situation sits a patriot's heart. He is set to wondering whether we, too, are equally deaf to the words of our own prophets, a our land in peril of spiritual blindness? May she, too, miss her day of visitation? God gives us listening ears for all our prophets—even when they come in a guise which offends all our prejudices and misconceptions. Let us love our land so fervently that we shall welcome the truth about her from any source whatsoever. Only by conserving our spiritual sensitiveness, and by cherishing our ethical and religious standards, may we insure our nation's truest welfare.

"America! America!"
 God shed His grace on thee,
 And crown thy good with brotherhood,
 From sea to shipping sea."

The Story-Sermon
 The particular last-day appeal which the Sunday Schools study to-day portrays the kingdom-call to Israel in the parable of the wedding feast. It is a sermon story, sketched in strong lines, and leaving imagination. Everybody could see the Jewish patron in the guests who had spurned their opportunity; and the turning to the whole Gentile world in the carrying of the gracious invitation out into the highways. Obviously, the first aspect of this parable which strikes the reader is the portrayal of the kingdom of heaven as a feast. Somehow, that idea has never gripped humanity, even though it was at a wedding that Jesus wrought His first great work. The ascetic, monastic, rigorous conception of the Christian life long held sway. Men esteemed religion a thing of fasting, rather than of feasting. It meant, in their mistaken view, rather a subtraction from the joys of life than an addition to them. That Jesus came to bring a more abundant life was an overlooked truth.

A change is being witnessed in our own day. A less somber view of religion prevails. A more social conception of Christianity has driven out much of our rigid Puritanism. The time-honored injunctions against life's pleasures are heard less and less. A vital church problem is how to provide a brighter and happier social life for people under the sheltering wing of the church. For it is to a feast that the gospel invitation calls.

Spurning Love's Offer
 A mother stooped to kiss her petulant child—and the child slapped the mother in the face. That, like the lesson parable, is a picture of the way love is often requited. The king who invited his friends to a feast found that they spurned his proffered hospitality.
 "Incredible?" "Not true to life?" Look around. See the thousands of youths rejecting education. Behold the boys who forsake loving homes for the pool rooms and street corners. Consider the men who turn their backs on wives and children and refined surroundings, to consort with gamblers and drunkards and still baser associates. Alas, it is only too true that human nature is capable of rejecting the best for the base.

Still more to the point, and truer to the parable, is the way the gracious invitations of God are rejected. There is no warrant in reason for the amazing indifference of Myriads to the fatherly goodness of God. That a kind creator should be flouted by his handiwork is more astounding than that a king should be insulted by his subjects. The Jews were, said to say, but true to the human type in turning their backs upon God's proffered goodness.

Opening a Wide Door
 A New York rich man built a home in a fashionable section of the city; his neighbors refused to receive him as a friend. In anger he moved from his house, and filled it with the poorest and least desirable of occupants. Not from pique such as this, but because the friends entitled to the first invitation were unworthy, the king in the parable extended his hospitality broadcast. The Jews spurned the proffered privilege, to the outside Gentile world it was given. The kingdom that was to have come through the Jewish nation is now coming aside from them.

The universality of religion's call, is the dominant note in to-day's thinking. To all men everywhere the invitation is due. Woe unto us if we, like the Jews of old, fail to carry to all men the summons to life's royal feast of heavenly love. Some other way, in such a case, would be found by the king for filling his house; but what of those who fall him? To-day the chief work of the church is to convey her Lord's hospitality into the world's uttermost highway.

The Disdainful Guest
 What of the man who went to the king's feast without a wedding garment, and was therefore cast into outer darkness? Is the king fastidious about clothes? The entire point of this incident in the story will be missed unless we remember the oriental character of it, and the usage which led the host to provide the wedding garment. A guest was at no expense for this. He had only to put on what was furnished him. To fail to do so meant to hold aloof from the festivities, and to flout the hospitality of the host. Such a breach of etiquette was this that it meant insult and enmity; where deference, gratitude and friendship were due.

Where is the parallel and message for us? No part of the story fits our day more closely. A contemptuous treatment of religion is common. Men speak patronizingly of the Lord Almighty. In thoughtless profanity and in open defiance, they jibe at the holy name of the Highest. Irreverence is a twentieth century sin. Now God is—necessarily—jealous of His own honor.
