Aunt Este's Stories For Children

My dear little ones: Next week Aunt Este wants to start a brand new series for you about what, for you think? Well, just our dear little friends—will the barn-yard fowls, and—oh, but there! I'm not going to tell you that, read your Telegraph every Saturday night and you shall find out; and if you know any good story about a barn yard fowl send it in to me and I will use it in writing a good little story. But to-night I am going to tell you a little birthday story in verse. If ever your birthday happened to come on a Sunday—and you were real cross about it because you couldn't have a party—listen to a good Sabbath story. The Little Girl, Whose Birthday Came on Sunday. Once there was a little girl whose birthday came on Sunday. "Oh dear," said she, "I wish that it had come on Monday." "Why so, my dear?" her mother asked. "What makes you wish for that?" "Because I'd like a party—and on Sunday you don't have that." "Oh yes, you can have the local kind; but don't ask your happy friends—you must some other kind." "But I can't have a party without my friends, you know," said this sweet tiny dimpling girl. "That's what a party's for." "Oh, yes, you can," said mother. "You can have one for the poor—in the alley over there is a poor, tired, sad lame boy, and a poor blind child who never saw a dolly, or a toy; a little one with just one leg—who cannot skip a rope." "Oh, that'll be fun!" said the little girl. "They'll come, I surely hope." So mother made a great big can of cream and baked some cake, and pulled some taffy till her arms felt ached, and they were ready for the party—you guess it did not rain. The little alley children came and had the grandest time. The sun shone out because he thought the little girl was fine to give a good time to such poor and wretched little ones. "If I can help" he said, "I'll make the children happy by the way." And so the children played and played and gobbled all the cake. They were, oh, so hungry and the wee girl's heart fairly ached. They went back home and talked about their party for a year for the little girl had brought to them a handful of good cheer. Her mamma said, "Such parties I'm sure the angels please, for in giving it you remember the very least of these." Lovingly,
