Cold Weather Makes Coal Burn Faster

Don't expect coal to burn just the same in very cold weather that it does when it is warmer. The colder the day the faster the coal will burn. You will need more draft on your furnace on a mild sultry day than on a clear cold day.

Just as soon as it gets cold we frequently have complaints that the coal is too soft. Now the coal is just the same, but it requires different treatment. The colder the weather the less draft you will need. It's a good plan to use a larger size coal when it is very cold.
