Helen came too close to the flame, and then both forgot about the light as Helen became absorbed in cutting up the raisins.

"Mr. Curtis loves this pudding," she explained proudly as she beat up the whites of eggs for the top. "I used to come to see me—before I was married. I mean." Helen smiled a little tenderly as she thought back. What a long time ago it was. What fun they used to have Sunday evenings when Warren would come in for supper. Warren had been a little more like Bob then.

She poured the pudding into a deep dish and carried it to the oven.

"You see Nora, it is very simple; you could make it alone next time. Don't you think so?"

Helen had come back to the table and was cleaning up the scraps. Nora protested. "I can do that, Mrs. Curtis; don't you bother. Helen leand over to reach for something and Nora gave a little cry of warning, it was too late, however, for the front of Helen's hair had caught and flamed up. It was all over in a sec-

It was a rainy day, the first in a long time, and Helen looked out disconsolately at the little rivers running swiftly along in the street and the umbrellas hurrying quickly by. Helen had always liked rain if she could be out in it, but to sit in the house doing nothing while the rain poured outside was not calculated to put her in the best of humors.

Nora came along the hall presently and put her head in at 'the door. She hesitated before speaking, but Helen had heard her and turned around with a smile.

"Everything's ready, ma'am, for you to show me how to make that pudding," she said. I hurried with my dishes, and the kitchen is all nica aid clean now."

Nora had snapped both of the electrict lights on, but neither lighted, so she lighted the gas jet over the table as Helen had said. The gas jet was convenient for lighting things, but rather precarious for the person worked under it.

"Be careful of your hair, Mrs Curtis." Nora advised several times as Helen came too close to the flame, and then both forgot about the light as Helen became absorbed in cutting up the raisins.

"Mr. Curtis loves this pudding," she explained proudly as she beat up the explained proudly as she beat up the proof she could not imagine what it out to be and the proof of she could not imagine what proposed in cutting up the raisins.

Takes Issue With Those Who Boom the Idea of Sole State Control of Dependents

Francis J. Torrance, president of he State Board of Charities, has taken the state Board of Charles, against a strong stand in interviews against the agitation by certain charity workers in favor of legislation at the comng session of the General Assembly to in the care of her dependents," he declared.

"There are just at this time many views expressed by many persons upon this grave subject, some by people who know what they are talking about and some by others who speak without experience or authority. We must, however, give credit to all for sincerity of purpose and commend them for a laudable interest in our work. None appreciates more than those who have these unfortunates in charge the need for hearty co-operation in this humanitarian mission.

Should Stand Pat

Should Stand Pat

"The policy of requiring each county in the Commonwealth to care for its own dependents should not be departed from at this time.

"Theer are in my mind many reasons why 'county care' should not be supplanted by so-called 'State care' of the indigent insane. The principle of home attention and home concern for the individual patient is more effective under the present system than under any other that could be devised. Several of the counties in the State, notably Beaver, Westmoreland, Washington and York, are now engaged in the construction of hospitals along the most modern and scientific lines for that the State's revenues will be con-siderably decreased and it will be at once seen what an imposition it would be to further burden the State."
