look at Warren and see that he means what he said.

"You are perfectly in earnest about wanting to leave Winifred out here with mother until next Fall?"

"Perfectly, I know that it would be the best thing to do. It's unfortunate that we live so far away from the country so that Winifred cannot be away more than she is."

"Warren, you know that Winifred is well, that nothing has been the matter with her since she had her operation."

8469-A Redingote Gown, 34 to 42 bust.

Everything that gives the redingote suggestion is fashionable. Here is a gown which in the picture is made of gabardine and charmeuse satin, but which could be copied in almost any seasonable material. Here the edges are bound with braid and that finish is a smart one for wool, but broadcloth could be used over a velvet skirt or velvet could be used over a velvet skirt or velvet could be used of or the redingote with satin, as it is here, or the redingote and sleeves both could be made of a plain material with striped or plaid for the skirt and vest. The sash may match the redingote or the skirt or be made of ribbon. The collar that is high at the back and open at the front is a very new feature. The sleeves may be made shorter if preferred, but the long ones have the approval of fashion. The redingote itself is made on simple, straight lines and requires no fit, so it is evident that it is an easy garment to make, while the skirt is a simple one in two pieces. OF BURGESS GRANGER'S COSTS

District Attorney M. E. Stroup and County Solicitor F. M. Ott were granted ten days by the Dauphin county court yesterday in which to show cause why the costs imposed by the grand jury in ignoring the case againss Edward Snavely, charged with violating the automobile laws, should not be stricken from the prosecutor, Burgess Henry S. Granger, of Royalton. The January quarter sessions grandjury refused to return a true bill against Snavely and placed the costs on Grangers, who instituted the action. Granger says he acted in good faith and as an officer of the law, he doesn't think he should be required to pay the costs.

"Yes, and do you suppose I would leave her out here where she might have another attack without me?"

"It isn't likely that she would have an attack in a dry atmosphere like this. It's the dampness of the city that affects her."

"Just the same I will never consent, never. That is final." And Helen, with an unexpected burst of temper, turned her head away as the tears coursed slowly down her cheeks.

Warren said nothing, just went on looking over some papers in his pocket and he and Helen hardly spoke until the train pulled in and they were making their way out, Helen walking ahead with Winifred and; Warren carrying the baggage, which consisted of a suit case and Helen's hand bag.

Warren carrying the baggase, consisted of a suit case and Helen's hand bag.

Helen's father was at the station and had picked up Winifred and slipped his arm about Helen before Warren had jumped down. There was no time to be anything but pleasant just then and Helen swallowed her disappointment and talked to her father on the way to the house as though nothing had happened. He was so taken up with Winifred, who chattered in the most engaging manner possible, that he did not notice any coldness in Helen's manner to her husband. Helen was too genuinely glad to be home to allow anything to spoil her happiness.

"How have you been?" she said eagerly. "Is mother well, and how is everything?"

"Everything's fine," said her father, looking at her with pride in his eyes, "and your mother is as well as usual, we both are."

Helen, confident that everything would be all right, was almost cordial to Warren, and it was Wnifired herself who brought up the subject by an innocent remark about staying with her Grandma always.

Warren looked up quickly, but Helen was examining an album as though nothing had happened.

"I guess you must stay with mother now, peaches," said her grandmother, pulling the perky bow on her tawny little head. "What would mother do without any little girl to talk to?"

In the midst of the joyous exclamation that followed the remark Helen's eyes met her husband's across the room. There was a questioning glance in his and hers were full of unspoken challenge. As he had said once long ago, Winifred belonged to both of them.
